Oral Answers to Questions

TRANSPORT

London Buses

1. Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received concerning the future of London Buses.

The Minister for Transport in London (Mr. Steve Norris): We have received a number of representations on our plans for the privatisation and deregulation of buses in London.

Mr. Corbyn: Is the Minister aware that the vast majority of people in London are violently opposed to the deregulation and privatisation of their bus services? Is the hon. Gentleman aware also that outside London in English metropolitan areas there has been a reduction of 24·8 per cent. in passenger journeys since deregulation took place? London bus drivers and conductors are being forced into accepting lower wages and longer working hours while operating disgracefully old buses. The average age of a London bus is over 13 years.

Does not the Minister think that it is time to listen to what the people of London say, to end nonsensical privatisation and deregulation and adhere to what is, basically, a very good bus service in London which can provide a decent and safe service for the people, rather than stepping into the unknown and the nonsensical concept of deregulation?

Mr. Norris: It is always nice to start the week with the sort of rant that reminds me why Conservative Members occupy the Government Benches while Labour Members are on the Opposition Benches. There are three essential conclusions to be drawn from the deregulation experience: first, operating costs have been reduced by a third; secondly, route mileage has increased by 20 per cent; and, thirdly, public subsidy has been reduced by half.

Mr. John Marshall: Does my hon. Friend agree that the privatisation and deregulation of London Buses will lead to innovation and the introduction of new services for the benefit of London's travelling public? Will he comment on the dishonest campaign that deregulation will mean the end of the bus pass?

Mr. Norris: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving me the opportunity to say just that. The concessionary fares that are offered to pensioners in London are financed by the boroughs. The provision for them to provide similar facilities is, and always has been, a cornerstone of our deregulation legislation. My hon. Friend put his finger on the matter. Developments in bus technology—midibuses and minibuses, for example—have all arisen as a consequence of deregulation and not the planning-led and sterile system that the Labour party appears to favour.

Mr. Tony Banks: Surely the Minister knows that outside London fewer people are using deregulated bus services rather than more. The Minister is out to lunch if he believes that the majority of Londoners are looking forward to deregulation in the capital. Can he defend a situation in which bus workers are being told that if they want to retain their jobs they will have to accept wage cuts of £20 or £30 a week, or more? Does he think that that is fair? It is not something which we would vote in favour of for ourselves and it is not something which we should inflict on London bus workers.

Mr. Norris: May I make it plain to the hon. Gentleman —I think that he knows—that people in London simply wish to see a better bus service. They are concerned that we should respond to their concerns as passengers. My right hon. and hon. Friends and I believe that deregulation will enable us to do that more effectively.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the renegotiated terms that London Buses Ltd. has discussed with some of its employees. That has put bus workers in the undertakings concerned on all fours with all of those who are employed in bus companies in the private sector. When the renegotiation has taken place, it has been accompanied by large payments which, generally, have been well in excess of £1,000, to buy out the previous uncompetitive working practices.

Mr. Forman: As some of my constituents, including those who work for London Buses, have expressed quite strong reservations about the liberalisation policy which I think my hon. Friend knows about, will he kindly set out for their benefit and for that of the House how it is that the experience of rural bus services, or services in rural towns, is relevant to the peculiar circumstances of Greater London?

Mr. Norris: I know, Madam Speaker, that you would not wish me to answer my hon. Friend exhaustively, so perhaps I can write to him in more detail. However, my hon. Friend will appreciate that the reduction in the use of buses has generally been associated above all with the growth in the use of the private car. People want to use their private cars and, when they can, they will generally do so. That is generally more possible outside London than inside. I repeat to my hon. Friend and for the benefit of the House that the key benefits of deregulation are substantial reductions in operating costs and increases in the number of bus miles operated.

Airbags

2. Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will introduce legislation to require all new cars to be fitted with airbags.

The Minister for Roads and Traffic (Mr. Kenneth Carlisle): Legislation on the compulsory fitting of airbags would have to be initiated by the European Commission. There is no restriction on their use in cars in the United Kingdom, but seat belts, which are effective and cheaper to fit than air bags, will remain the main personal restraint feature.

Dr. Jones: In view of the Minister's concern about road and passenger safety and of the likely delay in any legislation being implemented, is not it clear that more people will be looking to public transport? Will he therefore do battle with the Treasury over its nonsensical rules, which are preventing the Midland Metro scheme from going ahead? It is self-financing and will reduce the costs of accidents by £6 million in addition to creating 1,100 jobs.

Mr. Carlisle: That was a question which certainly had a lot to do with airbags—or windbags, if I may say so. Clearly, it is up to the individual how he or she wishes to travel, but, when people travel, by far the best thing that they can do to secure their safety is to wear a safety belt.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: May I say that my question is to do with airbags. Research currently being undertaken shows that the majority of accidents come from side impact. Will he promote research into protection from side impact, which is now more important than front or rear impact?

Mr. Carlisle: My hon. Friend makes a very good point. It is the design of the car which can now do most to prevent injury. The Transport Research Laboratory is researching the design of a car that would deal with side impact. We certainly intend to continue with that, but, as part of the single market, we have to persuade everyone else in Europe to go along with such measures. We are determined that more people will wear safety belts and we are making progress in that respect. I also welcome the fact that more United Kingdom models are now fitted with airbags, which offers genuine customer choice.

London-Carlisle Rail Service

3. Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he next intends to travel in an official capacity on the London-Carlisle InterCity train service.

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. John MacGregor): I did so last month. I would have travelled on the line again last Friday, but the strike meant that I was one of the passengers lost to British Rail that day, with corresponding substantial loss of revenue. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will condemn that counter-productive strike in the same way as I did.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Does the Secretary of State realise that we have waited a number of years for investment in that line and that its managers say that, unless investment is forthcoming, the line will simply collapse? I understand that the Minister intends to make an announcement in reply to my question, but may I pre-empt him by saying that, if investment is based on competition in which we are in a run-off with Kent for £150 million, that is not good enough? We demand investment now. The taxpayer has over the years paid a great deal of money to government on the basis that investment would be made in the line. Why cannot he give us an honourable statement today instead of what some might regard as a dishonourable cop-out?

Mr. MacGregor: I was asked when I intended to travel on the line and I was answering the hon. Gentleman's question. As to his supplementary questions, my hon. Friend the Minister for Public Transport hopes to make an announcement soon about rolling stock in relation to leasing. As to infrastructure, BR intends to start work renewing the west coast main line, but the precise timing will be decided later in the spring, when British Rail finalises its spending plans. When the hon. Gentleman talks about the taxpayers' contribution to British Rail, he should know that we spent record sums on capital investment in BR last year. It is expected that the figure will reach more than £1 billion this year—which is still substantial by any standards. The hon. Gentleman should recognise the relevance of my comment that British Rail is losing £10 million a day in the RMT strikes. If the hon. Gentleman favours investment, will he call on the RMT to stop the strikes, which are reducing investment rather than increasing it?

Mr. Brandreth: Is my right hon. Friend aware that that line services the great and beautiful city of Chester? Is he further aware that last Friday I, too, was unable to take my customary train to Chester and consequently took an aeroplane? I discovered that the journey to Chester via Manchester was half an hour faster. Does my right hon. Friend agree that Friday's futile strike not only did a grave disservice to our national railway system but gave a useful shot in the arm to British Airways?

Mr. MacGregor: When I was to share a platform with my hon. Friend on Friday afternoon, we both had to travel by air rather than take a train. I agree that the risk of such strikes is that passengers will be permanently lost to British Rail when they discover, as my hon. Friend did, that there is a quicker way to travel to Chester. The risk to freight is even more serious. I have endeavoured in a number of ways to get more freight off the road and on to the railways and I have presented to the House schemes for achieving that. Last Friday's strike and other strikes will cause that freight to be switched from rail to road, which would counterbalance anything that I am trying to do. That is why the strike is counter-productive.

Mr. Prescott: Does the Secretary of State accept that instead of hurling abuse at people in industrial disputes, it would be much better if he used his office to bring the parties together to achieve an agreement, rather than have disagreement? Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that his statement on British Rail's financial objectives one day before the first day's dispute, when British Rail was meeting the trade unions, which would have resulted in cutting investment by half and BR's revenue subsidy by 23 per cent., and in making another 5 per cent. of cuts, could only have added to the thousands of redundancies? Was not that statement designed to torpedo the talks?

Mr. MacGregor: That is absolute nonsense. The objective set for British Rail next year and the announcement that we made in the autumn statement will mean a somewhat smaller public service obligation grant than the year before. However, it is a good deal higher than two years ago and very much higher than for a long time. It is down only on the year before. What is more, it is being achieved by more efficient British Rail cost operations, which included the voluntary redundancies that it has achieved this year on generous terms.

Mr. Prescott: Yes.

Mr. MacGregor: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman acknowledges that they were voluntary. I hope that he agrees that, in the interests of the taxpayer, it is right that British Rail should seek to reduce its costs and thus to have a lower PSO—but it is still a good deal higher than earlier.

Mr. Prescott: What about investment?

Mr. MacGregor: Last year was an absolute record and this year it will be £1 billion—higher than in any period since the early 1960s and still very substantial. As to the strike, I have made it clear throughout that I support the British Railways Board. If the hon. Gentleman is in favour of investment in British Rail, does he not realise that it would be better for him to persuade the RMT to call off its strikes rather than support it in the way that he did? The hon. Gentleman is risking investment going down next year.

Mr. Adley: Leaving aside the rhetoric on both sides of the House about the strike, does my right hon. Friend agree that lack of investment on the west coast main line is having a deleterious effect on services? Is there any realistic likelihood, under his plans for the railways, of private sector investment in that line's infrastructure?

Is my right hon. Friend further aware that I have written to him three times to ask when I may present to him personally the literally hundreds of letters that I have received about his plans for the railways? Will my right hon. Friend ask his private office to deal with that little point as well?

Mr. MacGregor: I have replied to my hon. Friend. He writes me a very large number of letters and I endeavour to get a reply to him as quickly as possible. My hon. Friend asked me about infrastructure investment on the west coast main line. My hon. Friend the Minister for Public Transport will say something about that shortly.

Mr. Harvey: Will the Secretary of State comment on the impression given by the Minister for Public Transport to the Standing Committee considering the Railways Bill that the leased stock—the new rolling stock that is coming into the railway industry—will be given to the new franchisees? Does he agree that the existing rail users on the remainder of the service will not regard that as a golden handshake for them?

Mr. MacGregor: I understand that my hon. Friend did not say that to the Standing Committee.

Mr. Hawkins: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it has always been clear, as he confirmed yet again this afternoon, that British Rail has definite plans to upgrade and modernise the west coast main line as soon as possible? Does he further agree that the remarks of the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) when he is in the north-west, spreading gloom and despondency and scare stories about maintenance and safety on the west coast main line, can only drive passengers away, further damage the west coast main line and frustrate all the hopes that my constituents have of their direct through service from Blackpool to London being reintroduced? It is the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East, therefore, who is doing the damage to the west coast main line.

Mr. MacGregor: The intention and hope obviously is that, before long, we shall be able to start infrastructure investment on the west coast main line. Until now, it has been for British Rail to establish its investment priorities. In recent years, there have been massive sums of capital investment in other lines—£550 million on the east coast main line and £800 million on Network SouthEast. The west coast main line is now a clear candidate for investment priority. I have already said that British Rail hopes to renew the infrastructure on the west coast main line shortly. I entirely agree with what my hon. Friend said about the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East. The support that he has given to the RMT strike damages the interests and prospects of both passengers and investment. It is also unnecessary to spread scare stories.

West Coast Main Line

4. Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what offer he has received to modernise the west coast main line from the consortium of GEC Alsthom, Balfour Beattie and Trafalgar House.

The Minister for Public Transport (Mr. Roger Freeman): A consortium has expressed an interest in privately financing the infrastructure renewal of the west coast main line and we are studying the proposal. In addition, new rolling stock for this line is one of two options under consideration by British Rail for the £150 million rolling stock leasing facility announced in the autumn statement. The other option is upgraded dual-voltage Networkers for use on Network SouthEast's outer suburban services. I have today asked British Rail to invite tenders for both options. The eventual choice between then will depend on the bids received.

Mr. Hoyle: Is the Minister aware that breakdowns are occurring all the time? Only this morning when I travelled down to London the train was delayed because of engine failure. On the last four occasions that I have travelled there have been engine failures and long delays. Can the Minister say when decisions will be taken? Does not he realise that about £900 million needs to be invested in the west coast main line? Far from my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) talking about the safety risks, it was the route director for the west coast main line, Mr. Warburton, who made that statement. When will there be action? We are fed up with waiting.

Mr. Freeman: The hon. Gentleman is right to say that the cost of the infrastructure and rolling stock work is estimated to be about £900 million. We have today announced that British Rail is going out to tender for new inter-city west coast main line rolling stock and that it will compare those tenders with the bids received for the new class 465 Networkers. It is sensible to see what is the best value for both British Rail and the taxpayer. My right hon. Friend said that work will start very soon on resignalling the line and improving the infrastructure. British Rail has only just completed over £500 million of work on the east coast main line. It is important for British Rail now to turn its attention to the west coast main line, which should become the premier railway line in the country.

Mr. Jopling: Is my hon. Friend aware that the announcement this afternoon that tenders will be invited for improving the rolling stock on the lamentable west coast main line service is good news? Will he give the House an assurance that if both bids reflect good value for money, it is not impossible that both will be accepted?

Mr. Freeman: I can give my right hon. Friend the assurance that, as the leasing market develops, as surely it will—we hope within the next few weeks to be able to announce our conclusions on the consultation document on leasing—it is not out of the question that both options can be pursued.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Why does the Minister pretend that he has not taken evidence about the length of time it takes to place an order, to build the rolling stock and to get it into service? He knows very well that there is no market for second-hand, broken-down carriages which already produce an inadequate service. If he is not prepared to give us a genuine undertaking this afternoon that both lines are a priority, we shall know that his talk of wanting to support the passenger is so much hot air.

Mr. Freeman: I hope very much that because of the specific class of rolling stock that British Rail has selected —class 465 Networkers, which are dual voltage trains that can be used on Network SouthEast—and because of British Rail's decision to go out to tender for class 91 locomotives and mark IV coaches for the west coast main line, not much redesign work will be involved. I hope that the tenders will be returned quickly, that decisions can be made and that the trains will be manufactured quickly.

Mr. Gale: My hon. Friend will appreciate that his announcement this afternoon has profound implications for the future of the north Kent line. Given that, will he recognise that the trains for that line will mean jobs in construction for the United Kingdom and jobs that will enable north-east Kent to compete with Nord-Pas de Calais for jobs that would otherwise go to France? Will he impress on British Rail the importance of those trains to north Kent when the final decision is taken?

Mr. Freeman: I pay tribute to my hon. Friend's hard work in representing the best interests of his constituents on the Kent coast line. I can confirm that British Rail is well aware of the importance of improving the rolling stock in Kent, especially because, next year, new trains will provide channel tunnel services. It is important, certainly in outer Kent, that we have modern, efficient rolling stock which can compete, which offer good value for money and which will compare well with the new rolling stock to be introduced to the channel tunnel.

Mr. Bayley: Does the Minister recognise that the further delay in reaching an order, which his announcement today implies, puts at risk 1,600 jobs at the ABB works in my constituency and puts at risk jobs at GEC? Can he give us a firm date for when the order will be placed? Can he give the House an undertaking that he will approach the Treasury to get authorisation now for £300 million of leasing finance so that both orders can go ahead? Will he also give an undertaking that the whole build of whatever orders are placed will take place in this country because otherwise the British railway manufacturing industry will go the way of the British motor cycle industry, adding billions of pounds to our balance of payments deficit?

Mr. Freeman: No further delay will be caused by my announcement today. If the order had been for one line, there would still have had to be a tender procedure. There is no additional delay. I am well aware of representations from many hon. Members, including my hon. Friend the Member for Derby, North (Mr. Knight), who last week made very strong representations on behalf of ABB. If ABB wins an order, it will be good for York, for Derby and for Crewe. I am also well aware of the fact that GEC Alsthom is another major manufacturing company for rolling stock. We shall see what response we get from the bids. As I said in response to my right hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling), it is not beyond the bounds of possibility that the leasing market will so develop that we are able to proceed with re-equipping both lines.

Sir Roger Moate: Does my hon. Friend understand that, despite our welcome for the leasing finance, there is some disappointment at the fact that we have waited six months for a decision, but are now told that, between the two competing lines, there is only a 50-50 chance of one order being placed? That is not satisfactory. Why has it taken six months to reach that conclusion? If one line is not to be the loser, can my hon. Friend explain far more clearly to the House how it might be that if leasing finance develops within the coming weeks, both those orders, which are equally important, might be placed?

Mr. Freeman: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for drawing the attention of the House to the importance of the leasing market. I have given an assurance that we will make a statement as quickly as possible on the response to the consultation document on the procurement of rolling stock and leasing, and on how that market will develop. New opportunities will be opened up by these important developments and we will return to the House as quickly as we can to say how we see the way forward.

Mr. Wilson: As the Secretary of State seems to have some difficulty understanding his own handiwork, will the Minister confirm that in the current year investment in the existing railway will be at its lowest since nationalisation in 1948, and that a public service obligation grant cut of 23 per cent. is envisaged? That is bad news for the west coast line and for the system as a whole.

Will the Minister confirm that this pathetic damp squib of a statement is the direct consequence of playing two schemes off against each other when there is absolutely no need to do so? Instead of an announcement as to which of the schemes will go ahead, we have today had only a recycling of a previous announcement that two schemes are in the running. Does that situation have anything to do with the forthcoming county council elections?

Having finally accepted the leasing concept that the Opposition advanced 18 months ago, why have the Government still not given us a decision on a single line that will benefit from it? What possible reason is there for restricting leasing to one project instead of using the concept to develop and modernise our railways and to give some relief to the private railway industries which are starved of investment and are warning the Government that, due to the blight created by the threat of privatisation, 30,000 jobs are at risk in those industries in places such as York, Derby and Birmingham?

Mr. Freeman: In referring to investment, the hon. Gentleman always makes a simple error. Both he and the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) always exclude channel tunnel rail investment. That will be part of the existing railway this year because the channel tunnel will open this year—[HON. MEMBERS: "This year?"] Yes, this financial year. That is why, £1·4 billion worth of investment should be included. The channel tunnel is as much a part of the railway system as the London-Tilbury-Southend line.

Cyclists (Safety Equipment)

6. Mr. Booth: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what proposals his Department has to make the wearing of safety equipment by cyclists compulsory.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Cyclists are encouraged to wear cycle helmets and conspicuous clothing, and that message was reinforced in our recent "cycle safe" campaign.

Mr. Booth: I shall resist the temptation to ask again about airbags, but in the light of numerous allegations that, following cycling accidents, cranial and other head injuries are the principal anxieties of the medical community, will my hon. Friend give the House an assurance that he will continue his fine record in safety matters and that proper medical research will be undertaken into all such injuries so that we may reach an adequate decision?

Mr. Carlisle: I can advise my hon. Friend that the Transport Research Laboratory is carrying out research. It is important, however, that before making anything compulsory we ask ourselves where regulation stops and good sense begins. I believe that as a country we are in danger of over-regulating, with all the problems of bureaucracy and enforcement that that entails. I am convinced that in this instance persuasion is the right way forward. I believe that our recent cycle safe campaign was effective and got the message across.

Ms Walley: But what is the Minister doing to promote cycling and safer cycling? Is it not the case that his Department does not recognise the role of cycling in reducing congestions, and is it not time that he gave far more support to those throughout the country who wish to cycle?

Mr. Carlisle: I welcome the fact that people should bicycle safely if that is their choice. However, the hon. Lady has not listened to what I told her some months ago. I suggested then that she should go away and read our traffic advisory leaflets and local transport notes which offer advice in that area, the most recent of which was entitled "Making Way for Cyclists". That showed local authorities how to engineer routes to encourage cycling and make it safer.

Airport Security

7. Mr. Kynoch: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what further proposals he has for improving security at United Kingdom airports.

Mr. Norris: The Government have proposals for 100 per cent. hold baggage screening, for requiring airlines to account for and authorise for carriage all the baggage that they carry, and for improving the security of air cargo, mail and courier traffic.

Mr. Kynoch: As a frequent user of airliners, I am concerned that the Lockerbie disaster and the lessons learnt from it should be kept very much to the fore. I therefore welcome my hon. Friend's answer. Will he confirm that Britain is leading the way in Europe with those measures? Will he also reassure me that, as 80 per cent. of British air travel is international, he will give the highest priority to ensuring that the target of 100 per cent. is attained as soon as possible?

Mr. Norris: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising this subject and he is right to believe that the House takes the issue very seriously. I can confirm that my Department will continue to attach a high degree of importance to the whole issue of airport, airline and aviation safety generally. It may interest my hon. Friend to learn that our resources in that area have been increased tenfold since 1987.

Mr. Prescott: Can the Minister tell the House whether tests of aviation security at our airports carried out by his Department have shown standards to be unacceptably low four years after the Lockerbie tragedy?

Mr. Norris: I can confirm what my hon. Friend the Member for Kincardine and Deeside (Mr. Kynoch) said in his original supplementary—that standards in the United Kingdom are far in advance of those in virtually every other country in the world. From his knowledge of these matters, the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) will know that in terms of implementation of 100 per cent. screening by 1996, we are already making very substantial progress towards that and are way in advance of most other countries in Europe. On that basis, I am indeed satisfied with the measures that the Department and the airlines and carriers are taking.

Rail Privatisation

8. Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what commitments he intends shall be imposed on companies undertaking rail service franchises to maintain existing intermediate stops.

Mr. MacGregor: The commitments will be laid out in the franchise contract. The franchisee will not be able to cease serving a station contrary to the terms of that contract.

Mr. Beith: What if someone like Mr. Richard Branson has been running the east coast main line service for about a year and then comes back to the Department of Transport and says, "I'd like to try running the trains express from Edinburgh to London and miss out all the stops at Berwick, Dunbar and Alnmouth"? Will he be given permission to do that? If that venture led to the collapse of the service because of a losss of revenue due to a mistake in commercial judgment, what would happen to the communities who would lose their rail service in the meantime?

Mr. MacGregor: I do not wish to comment on who might get the franchise, but the right hon. Gentleman will know that franchisees wishing to alter service patterns below the minimum specified—the kind of situation that the right hon. Gentleman has in mind—must give notice of that proposal to the franchising director who, after due consideration, will accept or reject the proposal. If there is a continuing demand for the service from which a franchisee might wish to withdraw, I believe that the franchising director would look very carefully at any such proposition. If there were any suggestion of the closure of a station or a service, all the normal statutory procedures which have applied in recent years would apply in the future.

Mr. Matthew Banks: Does my right hon. Friend agree that one of the advantages of bringing in new franchisees is that it would allow the private sector to bring forward new ideas and new products?

Mr. MacGregor: Yes, I very much agree. The whole purpose of our proposals is to improve the services for passengers, not to see them withdrawn.

Airlines (Competition)

9. Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is his policy with regard to competition among United Kingdom airlines.

Mr. MacGregor: The Government's policy is to encourage free, fair and open competition among airlines to the benefit of both consumers and airlines.

Mr. Jenkin: Will my right hon. Friend accept my congratulations on the leading role that the Government have played in liberalising the airline industry throughout Europe? Is that not already shown in the recent reductions in prices on European routes? May we now look forward to greater freedom for airlines throughout Europe?

Mr. MacGregor: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who is absolutely right. I do not think that the significance of the third aviation package in the European Community has yet been fully appreciated in opening up competition and liberalising the skies across Europe. Indeed, its effects are already being felt earlier than many people predicted. I am glad to say that, as the British Government were in the forefront of arguing for the changes and getting them, British airlines are in the forefront of taking advantage of them.

Since the new package came in on 1 January, British Midland has launched its Diamond Euroclass cabin in a new package offering savings of up to 40 per cent. compared with other airlines on seven routes in the Community and just outside it. Since then, other airlines, including British Airways, Aer Lingus, KLM and Air France, have followed suit and brought down their fares. That is a clear example of our new competition package operating to the benefit of consumers.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMISSION

National Audit Office

31. Mr. Dowd: To ask the Chairman of the Public Accounts Commission what proportion of the National Audit Office's resources in 1993-94 will be devoted to the certification of public accounts.

Sir Peter Hordern (Chairman of the Public Accounts Commission): The National Audit Office is allocating 44 per cent. of its budget for audit work to certification activities in 1993-94.

Mr. Dowd: I thank the Chairman of the Public Accounts Commission for that response. Can he give the House his estimate of the increase in costs that will be required by the National Audit Office to undertake a more detailed analysis of the accounts that come before it, such as the components under the main headings of the accounts of Government Departments? Given that it is likely to be a large and disproportionate increase in costs, what guidelines is the Commission prepared to offer through the National Audit Office to Departments to ensure that what is defined in main headings is what is included in those parts of the accounts so that items such as Ministers' legal expenses cannot be buried under headings such as "stationery"?

Sir Peter Hordern: The National Audit Office expects to increase the number of certifications that it does during the next few years from 498 to 560, at a significant reduction in real costs. I do not expect anything to happen during the next few years that will involve extra costs for the National Audit Office. The Public Accounts Commission is satisfied with its further programme.

Mr. Janner: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Select Committee on Employment has asked the National Audit Office whether it can work out the true cost of unemployment, especially what it costs when a person is made unemployed, not merely as a result of tax not paid but in terms of the benefits that the person and his family will receive? Will the right hon. Gentleman be good enough to lean on the National Audit Office to provide that information, because I am sure that no one else in the United Kingdom is willing to do so?

Sir Peter Hordern: I will certainly pass the hon. and learned Gentleman's comments on to the Comptroller and Auditor General. Strictly speaking, it is more a matter for the Public Accounts Committee than for the Commission, but I will certainly pass on the hon. and learned Gentleman's views.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Will the right hon. Gentleman answer specifically the question that he was asked about ministerial expenses and how they are defined in departmental accounts? Is he concerned about what has happened recently? Does he think that he should perhaps convene a meeting with the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee and the Comptroller and Auditor General to see whether a way forward can be found whereby such expenses, when incurred, are clearly set out in Government accounts in a way that the public can understand?

Sir Peter Hordern: These are important and interesting matters and can be dealt with fully by the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, to which the hon. Gentleman has every access.

TRANSPORT

Rail Privatisation

10. Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the progress of his plans to franchise the Great Western line.

Mr. MacGregor: Great Western Intercity is one of the seven service groups that I have asked British Rail to prepare for early franchising. I have asked BR to create a separate Great Western operating company so that potential franchisees can see how the services perform before making their bids.

Mr. Coombs: My right hon. Friend will be well aware that the InterCity 125 diesel locomotives have been in operation for 20 or more years and are coming naturally towards the end of their useful working life. Will he bear that fact in mind in assessing the length of the franchise that might be awarded in the Great Western region to ensure that there is a sufficient payback period for an operator to make the new capital investment which will be needed?

Mr. MacGregor: Yes, I am aware that in due course the diesel locomotives will have to be replaced. I make two points to my hon. Friend. First, the length of the franchise, which will be for the franchising director to establish, will reflect the commitment and investment that the potential franchisees are prepared to put in. In other words, if they are prepared to make a substantial investment in rolling stock, the franchisees will expect a longer franchise than would otherwise be the case. Secondly, my hon. Friend the Minister for Public Transport will come forward shortly with the responses to the consultation document on leasing of rolling stock. That is also relevant.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Creche Facilities

32. Mr. Flynn: To ask the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, as representing the House of Commons Commission, pursuant to his oral answer to the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mrs. Jackson) of 22 February, Official Report, column 678, what progress has been made in making creche facilities available for the children of hon. Members and of House of Commons staff.

34. Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, as representing the House of Commons Commission, if he will make a statement on progress on the provision of creche facilities in the House.

Mr. A. J. Beith (on behalf of the House of Commons Commission): Since I last answered questions on the subject on 22 February, the Administration Committee has considered the possibility that the House might take up a small number of places in a projected joint venture nursery near Vincent square. The Committee turned down the proposal as inappropriate and has consulted the Commission on the need for a comprehensive survey of all possible users. That will now be taken ahead, with the Commission's full support.

Mr. Flynn: How can the Commission maintain that there is not room within these buildings for a creche when we have room for a shooting gallery and several rooms are used for wining and dining which is not parliamentary but entirely commercial and party political in character? Do we have to wait until the present crop of children who might now be in nursery school are attending university before a creche is provided? Does the right hon. Gentleman not realise that there are special problems for the 2,000 staff in the building and especially for Members of Parliament as the peculiar demands of our jobs mean that many of our families are brought up for most of the year in a single-parent context?

Mr. Beith: The Commission is well aware of the problems and the proposals for dealing with them. That is why it intends to undertake the survey. The hon. Gentleman must address his views about the use of rooms in the building to the Accommodation and Works Committee. However, I am bound to say that the public authorities would probably not look kindly on the use of a basement now used as a shooting gallery for a children's creche.

Mr. Win Griffiths: Why is it taking so long for the creche facilities to be provided when so many Members have urged for several years that action be taken? It seems to us that once again obstacles and delay are being put in the way of the provision of facilities. Will the right hon. Gentleman tell us a date by which he hopes to see the facilities provided?

Mr. Beith: I should like to see the facilities provided as soon as possible, but the hon. Gentleman should discuss with his hon. Friends who are members of the appropriate Committee the difficulties that they foresee in providing accommodation from the present parliamentary estate. They made the decision to which I referred, and they must be well aware of the difficulties.

Mr. Burns: May I ask my right hon. Friend fully to appreciate that although it may not be popular with some of our colleagues, the House of Commons must be brought into the 20th century? In the past two decades or so, many men and women who are younger and have young children have become Members of Parliament. It seems inappropriate that while the Government and other organisations encourage and foster the provision of creche facilities, this establishment seems remarkably reluctant to provide the facilities that it encourages the private sector and other sections of the community to provide.

Mr. Beith: The Commission has no reluctance on the matter so long as demand can be shown and satisfactory accommodation can be provided.

Mrs. Helen Jackson: Does the right hon. Gentleman recall that the questions that I asked him in February and on the first sitting day in 1993 did not refer to surveys? The House is not asking for surveys—it is asking for action, and action this year. A creche facility is not specialised —it requires toilets and water, but it should not be impossible to find space within the various buildings of the Palace of Westminster which contain such facilities. May we have some action, please?

Mr. Beith: The joint venture, which the Administration Committee regarded as inappropriate, would have provided only six places, and would have done so at a relatively high cost. It was partly because of the inadequate number of places that the Commission felt it necessary to support a proper survey, to see how many people would use this facility.

Accommodation

33. Mr. Fabricant: To ask the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, as representing the House of Commons Commission, what provision has been made in 1993-94 for the building of further accommodation.

Mr. Beith: A total of £10·5 million has been made available in 1993-94 to cover the remaining works at No. 7 Millbank and to continue the design work on phase 2 of the new parliamentary building.

Mr. Fabricant: Will the right hon. Gentleman bear in mind that, as well as the need for offices, we need rooms for meetings and other larger ones? Is it not extraordinary that hon. Members on both sides of the House have to traipse like stones to the bowels of the Treasury to donate blood?

Mr. Beith: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman's journey across the road is well worth while and in the public interest. It illustrates the problems that we have in providing for a wide range of facilities in this building, as well as ensuring that hon. Members and their staff are adequately accommodated. That is why the Commission authorised the accommodation at 7 Millbank and why we are proceeding with work on the new parliamentary building.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: What has been the cost of the upkeep of this Palace, building and refurbishing offices, pampering the secretaries and providing ridiculous services, more of which—such as creches—have been suggested this afternoon? Why not have nannies and nurses as well? Will the right hon. Gentleman state the cost over the past 10 years of the appalling extravagances in which we expect the public not to indulge but which we have given to ourselves?

Madam Speaker: Order. That is a most interesting question, but one which requires notice.

Printing Costs

35. Mr. Steen: To ask the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, as representing the House of Commons Commission, what proportion of the expenditure of the Commission goes on printing for the House.

Mr. Beith: The estimates for 1993-94 include provision of £18·6 million for expenditure on printing and publications, most of which is incurred in the supply of parliamentary papers.

This represents some 18·5 per cent. of the total estimates for House of Commons administration and works services for the year.

Mr. Steen: Clearly, printing costs have gone through the roof. While we expect that other bodies should manage their affairs efficiently and run them more cheaply each year, why is it that each year we run our own more expensively? Why do we allow this bureaucracy to go on and on increasing? As it costs £200 or more for each oral question to be answered, including this one, why should there not be a limit to the amount that hon. Members can spend each year on questions? While the right hon. Gentleman is looking at questions, will he also look at the bureaucracy of the House and the Serjeant at Arms Department?

Mr. Beith: Any limit on the ability of hon. Members to ask questions would be very controversial and a matter for the Procedure Committee and not for the Commission, which provides the services necessary for the House to do its job. The House printing requirements are unusual in that there is a large amount of overnight printing of Hansard and other parliamentary papers. Discussions are taking place now as to how to carry out that work most efficiently. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will find that that will lead to a considerable containment of the costs.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Would the right hon. Gentleman like to suggest, both to the Government and to his fellow Members, that one easy way of cutting down on the amount of paper that we produce would be to return to the habit of Ministers taking responsibility for their own questions and their appearance in the Official Report instead of occasionally allowing vast, pointless and frequently opaque replies to be printed in Hansard?

Mr. Beith: I hope that the hon. Lady's question will be noted on the Front Bench, as Ministers alone can act on it.

TRANSPORT

Midland Line (Electrification)

11. Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has had any recent discussions with representatives of local authorities and others regarding the midland line electrification.

Mr. Freeman: Yes. I attended a meeting of the Association of County Councils in Nottingham on 26 March, when the possible electrification of the midland main line was discussed.

Mr. Skinner: What is the Minister going to do about it? Now that he has met the local authorities will he put them in the lucky bag with the west coasst line and the Kent line? The Government are trying to kid local authorities into believing that they are getting something before the county elections, but when those elections are over the net result will be that the midland line electrification will fall. Is the Minister aware that the Government have spent too much time attacking the railway unions, which are fighting for the livelihoods and jobs of their members, when the Government should be concentrating on improving the rolling stock and electrification up and down Britain?

Mr. Freeman: Every day of the rail strike, which the hon. Gentleman supports, means £10 million less investment in British Rail.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Oral Questions

36. Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will make a statement about the operation of the system of handing in oral questions at the Table Office.

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Tony Newton): Since the beginning of the 1990-91 Session, hon. Members may table, in person, a maximum of two questions to each Minister: one in their own name, and one for another hon. Member. Questions are handed in at the Table Office between 10 am and 5 pm a fortnight before the date on which they are to be answered.

Mrs. Gorman: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply. I am aware, as he is, that the previous system was often abused by Members turning out multiple versions of their questions and handing them in through a variety of sources. Is my right hon. Friend aware, however, that Back Benchers are often away from the House in their constituencies, or on Select Committee on other business, perhaps at short notice, and find it extremely difficult to be in the House two weeks in advance to hand in their question? As an alternative to the present system, may I suggest that so long as Members write out their question by hand and sign it as the original copy, they should be allowed to post it if they have a legitimate reason for being unable to be in the House to hand it in as it is not always possible to find a colleague to do so in one's place?

Mr. Newton: As you, Madam Speaker, will be aware, alongside other changes made for the 1990-91 Session mentioned by my hon. Friend, the time available for handing in oral questions was, if I remember correctly, extended from 4 pm to 5 pm. I am prepared to consider any representations, and my hon. Friend might like to make suggestions to the Procedure Committee. If it could be convincingly shown that sufficient difficulties were being caused to justify changes, that might be considered. We must bear in mind the need to ensure that those responsible for preparing the Order Paper and determining the order of questions also have adequate time to do their work.

Standing Committee on Regional Affairs

37. Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Lord President of the Council what representations he has received on the subject of the Standing Committee on Regional Affairs.

38. Mr. Mudie: To ask the Lord President of the Council what representations he has received proposing matters to be referred to the Standing Committee on Regional Affairs as provided by Standing Order No. 100.

Mr. Newton: I have received one letter about the Standing Committee on Regional Affairs and the matter has been raised occasionally at business questions.

Mr. Pickthall: As the Scots and the Welsh rightly have Select Committees and Grand Committees to discuss their affairs, is not unacceptable that the one Committee in which English regional affairs could and should be discussed has not met since 1978? Now that every English region is suffering from industrial decline and infrastructural and unemployment problems, does the right hon. Gentleman agree that every Member of the House who represents an English constituency would welcome the opportunity of speaking and participating in that Committee?

Mr. Newton: As the hon. Gentleman himself acknowledged, once the Committee had been set up—the Standing Order providing for that having been put in place in the mid-1970s—it rapidly fell into virtually total disuse and has met only twice since the 1975-76 Session, which suggests that no one has seen any great merit in its proceedings. As I have said on a number of occasions, I for one am not persuaded that it would be right to undertake meetings in the way the hon. Gentleman would wish. I have been trying to ensure proper opportunities for debate on the Floor of the House on matters such as tourism and on other subjects raised under this head.

Mr. Harris: Does my right hon. Friend appreciate that a number of Conservative Members would very much welcome an opportunity to pursue our regional interests in just such a Committee, especially Members who represent the south-west in view of the iniquitous water charges imposed by South West Water, to mention just one subject that we should like to examine in detail in such a Committee?

Mr. Newton: I note my hon. Friend's support for one particular aspect of this request and I hope that it was clear that my phrasing did not absolutely rule out consideration of this matter. However, I am certainly not at present persuaded of the case for it.

Mrs. Beckett: Will the Lord President reconsider that answer? He referred to the relatively small number of occasions on which the Committee was convened in the 1970s, but if he studies the record he will find that it was extremely well attended. Twenty, thirty and even sixty Members were in attendance to discuss issues of exactly the kind that the hon. Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) has mentioned. I think that there would be a strong welcome on both sides of the House for such a move.

Mr. Newton: I admit that I have not researched the attendance at those meetings, but as membership of the Committee consists of all hon. Members with English constituencies, plus five others nominated by the Committee of Selection, the attendance figures that the right hon. Lady has given were rather low.

Bosnia

3.31 pm

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Douglas Hurd): With permission, I should like to make a statement on Bosnia.

There is today a fragile ceasefire in Srebrenica. One hundred and thirty-three military and civilian wounded were evacuated yesterday by helicopter to Tuzla. It is hoped to bring out a further 200 today. British Sea King helicopters are taking part in this airlift.

Canadian troops have been deployed into Srebrenica to monitor the ceasefire arrangements. Their involvement is based on Security Council resolution 819 adopted last Friday, which demanded that Srebrenica and its environs should be treated as a safe area.

There has been heavy fighting between Muslim and Croat forces in central Bosnia. Some of our troops, the Cheshires, are stationed in the area. They are doing what they can to mediate. This fighting has brought a halt—I hope a temporary halt—to the flow of relief convoys.

Our troops on the ground, and the RAF in supplying Sarajevo, have done superb work. Our troops have so far escorted 450 convoys carrying 34,000 tonnes of aid. Many of the convoys in central Bosnia are maintained and driven by over 100 ODA employees. In over 400 flights the RAF has carried 6,000 tonnes. The Government have contributed £92 million to the international relief agencies, bilaterally and through the EC.

It was predicted last autumn that almost half a million Bosnians would die of starvation during the winter. Most of them are still alive, thanks in large part to the relief effort. We need to continue that effort as long as possible, because people can starve in spring and summer as well as winter. But we all accept that keeping people alive does not by itself solve the problem. In the end, a lasting solution to the Bosnian conflict can be achieved only by a political settlement. That is why we have given our full support to the efforts of Lord Owen and Mr. Vance. Their proposals have been agreed by the Muslims and Croats. The Serbs have prevaricated, made unacceptable territorial demands and meanwhile continued their aggression with the hideous suffering which we have all seen. The Government in Belgrade have not used what we believe to be their considerable influence to put a stop to this behaviour.

We must therefore intensify pressure on the Serbs. RAF Tornadoes have now been called upon to join in enforcement of the no-fly zone. On Saturday, we voted for the immediate adoption of Security Council resolution 820, imposing further and intense sanctions unless the Serbs stop their attacks and agree to a political settlement by next Monday, 26 April.

These new sanctions are based on a package prepared by the European Community at our instigation over two months ago. Their passage in the Security Council was not easy. The Russians, who of course hold a veto, wanted to allow the Serbs more time, but in view of the continuing Serb aggression around Srebrenica, we considered that action had to be taken immediately as a clear signal of resolve. We are looking to turn sanctions into a blockade. These new sanctions are wide in scope and effectively close down Serbia's border. We must use the days and weeks leading up to their introduction to ensure the tightest possible enforcement in four ways—by sea, by river, on land and against financial services.

In the Adriatic, there are already NATO and WEU monitoring forces, including HMS Cardiff, which have prevented all but three vessels from entering Montenegrin ports since November last year. The new Security Council resolution provides further powers, notably the prohibition of all commercial and maritime traffic from entering Yugoslav territorial waters except when specifically authorised. On the Danube, there are plans for deploying a WEU monitoring flotilla. Together with the sanctions assistance missions already in place, these should go a long way to curb sanctions breaking. There is a need for better co-operation between the riparian states and the international community to ensure that there are no loopholes. We shall pursue that vigorously.

As for passage of freight over land, the new resolution calls for the closure of all freight crossing points, with limited exceptions. There are problems with the passage of goods across some of the borders with Serbia and Montenegro. Much needs to be done so that traffic is physically prevented from moving except at the designated points. We shall need more sanctions assistance monitors to help the customs authorities of the neighbouring states monitor their borders and police the crossing points round the clock. Finally, on the financial sanctions, it is not so much a matter of scope as of strict enforcement and that is an obligation on all Governments. We must ensure that there are no weak points.

We know that Serbia is already hard hit by sanctions and vulnerable to tighter sanctions, provided—and it is a big proviso—that they are properly enforced. This is a strenuous task and many international organisations are involved. I have proposed the appointment of a co-ordinator, who would have to be high powered, to build up this work and, when necessary, knock heads together. So much for the sanctions resolution passed at the weekend and which now has to be enforced.

Against the background that I have sketched, which is familiar to all hon. Members, we cannot refuse to look at all ideas, including those which have been considered before but not adopted. The debate on other options is at a similar stage in London as in the capitals of our major partners. I think that the House would agree that it is essential that policy should be agreed by the international community. I shall mention two such options, those which are most often discussed in the media and probably in the House.

There have been calls for removal of the mandatory United Nations arms embargo against the Bosnian Government. The House will be aware of the Government's reservations about that. The move would require Russian consent in a new Security Council resolution. I do not believe that relaxation would in practice be limited to one party. This would be in effect letting the parties fight it out—Serb against Muslim, Muslim against Croat, as today in central Bosnia, and Croat against Serb. The Government recognise that it would give the Muslims the opportunity to gain better access to the arms that they need. There is the danger that it might prolong and extend the conflict and would undoubtedly put into serious question our ability to sustain our humanitarian effort.

There are also advocates of air strikes against selected Serb targets as a way of putting further pressure on the Serbs to sign the Vance-Owen plan and, indeed, to reduce the risk of attacks on further Muslim enclaves. Discussion of that is at much the same stage in different capitals.

[Mr. Douglas Hurd]

We have considered the options again this morning. We must take account of the view of our military advisers that such strikes would probably have only limited military value unless supported by troops on the ground, given the nature of the terrain and the nature of the conflict. We must take into account the high risk of civilian casualties. I think that that risk would be very high. As with other options, we cannot rule out anything as the situation develops.

We shall stay in close touch with our allies and partners, but we should not go down this or any other route without a reasonable judgment that it would do more good than harm. We should not lightly jeopardise the continued humanitarian role played by the United Nations and by our own forces. We need to consider not just what sounds satisfying today—or even tomorrow—but where we might stand, say, four or five weeks, or four or five months, after the first air strike or the first delivery of arms.

The anger and frustration aroused by the savageries in eastern Bosnia are entirely justified. Our objectives are—indeed, must be—to make the Bosnian Serbs and the Serb Government abandon the pursuit of their aims by the use of force; to prevent the fighting from spreading to Croatia, Kosovo, Macedonia or elsewhere; to provide the wherewithal, through the Vance-Owen process, for a just political solution; and to relieve the needs of the hungry and the sick.

As the Prime Minister said last night, the Serbs and the Bosnian Serbs should realise that there will be no acceptance for, and therefore no stability in, gains achieved as they have sought to achieve them. Their only hope for a stable, let alone a prosperous, future lies in changing course and bringing these horrors to an end.

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): I welcome the Foreign Secretary's decision to respond to our request for a statement about the situation in Bosnia. Will he assure the House that he will keep us informed about what is a very delicate position, as well as a dangerous and fragile one? If events take a significantly different course, we shall expect further statements from him this week.

I support what the Foreign Secretary said about the work that our troops are doing at present, in incredibly difficult circumstances. Should we not remind ourselves and the country—including the commentators who continue to say that nothing is being done—that enormous achievements have resulted from the deployment of our troops in support of the humanitarian efforts of the United Nations? It ill becomes those of us who sit comfortably at home to undermine or belittle those efforts. I urge everyone, regardless of their views—I know that there are wide differences of view—to give our troops the wholehearted support that they deserve and have earned.

Like the Foreign Secretary, I welcome the fragile ceasefire that has been arranged around Srebrenica; but experience tells us that, like many ceasefires before it, it is unlikely to endure. There is therefore no point in sitting back and waiting for further developments: further pressure must be brought to bear now on Serbia and its clients, the Bosnian Serbs.

I welcome the change of mind displayed by Her Majesty's Government, for which we asked a week ago. We asked the Government to seek an immediate recall of the United Nations Security Council to discuss the circumstances in Bosnia, and to set aside President Yeltsin's objections to such a meeting. We all recognise the difficulties and the political circumstances in Russia, but they were no reason for standing aside or delaying a meeting of the Security Council to consider the deteriorating circumstances in Bosnia and the potential slaughter of 50,000 people in Srebrenica. So that change of heart was welcome.

I cannot welcome, however, the decision once again to delay further sanctions against Serbia. The existing mandatory sanctions were implemented by the United Nations Security Council in May 1992. The reality is that many hon. Members on both sides of the House have been calling for the rigorous implementation of those sanctions since then, for an economic blockade of Serbia, which there has been no attempt to put in place. That was recognised by the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry a few weeks ago when he spoke in Committee about licensing, and specifically the licensing of trade to Croatia, and said:

> "There is no precise estimate of evasion, but more than 466 licences have been issued and only 60 have been returned. The Committee will appreciate that there is an enormous hole somewhere into which all those goods are going."—[Official Report, European Standing Committee B, 17 March 1993, c. 4.]

That is an admission by a Minister that existing sanctions are not being implemented effectively. We know from comments outside, including those made by Lord Owen, that large sums are being laundered in the same way that criminals, including drug operators, launder their moneys. That is being done with the assistance of the banking system in Europe, and that should be stopped, too.

We can welcome the belated determination to apply additional sanctions, but I believe that it is idle to suppose that they can be applied quickly enough or effectively enough to bring the Bosnian Serbs to the negotiating table again.

I agree with what the Foreign Secretary said in support of the mandatory arms embargo. The Labour party is committed in its constitution to the United Nations. My colleagues and I support the decisions of the Security Council, and especially the arms embargo. It seems ridiculous that the people who are arguing for an end to the embargo are, in the next sentence, advocating military intervention on the ground in Bosnia.

We could not abrogate the arms embargo in respect of the Muslims alone. The supporters of the Serbs and those of the Croatians would pour additional weapons into the appalling conflict. We should emphatically endorse the embargo against all the protagonists. We would not support any unilateral abrogation of it, whether by the United States of America or by any other country.

Nor do we accept that there is any sensible or legitimate argument for intervention by ground forces. We believe, however—I impress upon the Prime Minister, the Foreign Secretary and the Government generally the view expressed by my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition this weekend—that it is time that the Security Council issued an ultimatum to the Serbs. It is now overdue for the United Nations to insist that, first, there should be safe passage for refugees, for women and children, for the wounded and for soldiers who have surrendered in places such as Srebrenica. There should be a permanent ceasefire and the Serbs should agree to sign the Owen-Vance peace plan. Unless they are prepared to do that, the Security Council should consider authorising a punitive air strike against the Serbs' supply lines in Bosnia.

I do not say that lightly because I recognise that there is no such thing as a clinical military action and that the risk of civilian casualities would be significant. I also agree that, before such action could be contemplated, we would have to consider the whole future of the humanitarian aid effort and the participation of our troops in it because we would not endorse any action that placed them in jeopardy on the ground in Bosnia. It may be—we should not shrink from this reality—that such an action and the continuation of the humanitarian aid effort are mutually exclusive and that we could have one or the other, but not both. That is a matter for very difficult and serious political judgment.

I understand as well as anyone the anger and the anguish which is being expressed in the House and throughout the country, but no one, especially not hon. Members, should pretend that there are any simple or quick military solutions which could be imposed on the circumstances that prevail in Bosnia or the former Yugoslavia as a whole.

We support a great deal of the right hon. Gentleman's statement, although we do not think that it goes far enough. I urge on him serious consideration of further discussions in the Security Council along the lines that I have suggested.

Mr. Hurd: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for most of what he said. I of course undertake that we shall continue to keep the House informed. I welcome what he said, which was in harmony with what I said, about the role of our forces.

On the Security Council, there is no change of mind on our part in the timing of the debate or the timing of implementation. The right hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that nothing can be agreed in these matters without Russian acquiescence. In the past fortnight I have had several meetings with the Russian Foreign Minister, as have others. It was only at the weekend that, after many difficulties, the Russians were brought to accept an immediate vote and implementation next week. It is not to be taken for granted, and it is not to be taken for granted in the future. It is a matter not of delay or prevarication on our part but of obtaining the absolutely necessary acquiescence of Russia for the measures that have been taken. Thank heavens that, in the end, the Russians felt able to acquiesce.

The right hon. Gentleman is not entirely accurate about sanctions, although I agree that implementation, especially on the financial side, leaves much to be desired. I mentioned the flotilla in the Adriatic. There is no doubt that it has managed to check what was at one time a substantial inflow of sanctions-barred traffic into the Montenegrin ports. Equally, the right hon. Gentleman knows about the sanctions-assistance missions already in place in the Danube states, but the general thrust of his comments is perfectly right: it is partly a matter of making better use of existing sanctions, and it is now a matter of finding effective machinery for enforcing the new ones voted 48 hours ago.

I agree with and am grateful for the way in which the right hon. Gentleman spoke of the arms embargo. He put it well. However, I have a little difficulty with his point about air strikes. I understand the reasoning behind what the Leader of the Opposition and the right hon. Gentleman said. They are saying that the Security Council should give an ultimatum to the Serbs to deal with a number of matters, some of which are being dealt with, such as arrangements for Srebrenica, and that, if the Serbs did not comply after a time, there would be a single punitive air strike. He went on to show that he understands that that would put at risk the humanitarian effort which we are undertaking and which is saving a great many lives.

The right hon. Gentleman did not say on which side he would come down if it turned out that one was at the expense of the other. I cannot see a great deal of point in a single punitive air strike if that put at risk the whole United Nations' humanitarian effort.

The right hon. Gentleman's proposals simply illustrate the difficulties. I repeat that we are not excluding action of that kind because we work with our allies and our partners, but before we decide together on action we want to be sure that it would in practice—because we cannot bluff in these matters—leave the situation better than it is today.

Sir Michael Marshall (Arundel): Does my right hon. Friend accept that one of the main calls coming from the Inter-Parliamentary Union conference that ended in New Delhi on Saturday was for the urgent assembling of an international parliamentary mission to visit the former Yugoslavia? Does he agree that, given that Yugoslavia is a member of the Inter-Parliamentary Union but not of the United Nations, such an exercise is worthy of consideration? Will he keep his mind open on that possibility?

Mr. Hurd: I will examine my hon. Friend's suggestion. It is a matter not so much of organising parliamentary missions but of parliamentarians of all kinds and of all countries making clear to those who are or who have been parliamentarians in the republics of Yugoslavia the sense of anger and frustration that is evident in this country and in all others.

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): Does the Foreign Secretary accept that it would be possible, practicable and in accordance with existing Security Council resolutiion 757 for the United Nations to deploy troops between the advancing Serbs and the Muslim enclaves to prevent further shelling and advance? There is much evidence to suggest that that approach would be acceptable to Serb and Muslim alike. Does the right hon. Gentleman have any further information about the meeting yesterday between General Phillipe Morillon and Dr. Karadzic concerning the possibility of the United Nations taking control of the administration of Srebrenica?

Mr. Hurd: There are talks also today about the administration of Srebrenica and the various points at issue in the ceasefire which has been negotiated—and which is holding so far. That is a continuing discussion. The hon. Gentleman's first point was raised in correspondence between the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) and my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. We do not believe that the existing Security Council mandate covers the kind of exercise that the hon. Gentleman suggests. It is difficult to envisage such an exercise, which would be extremely dangerous. I am not sure how long those troops would be held in position. I do not myself believe that is a workable plan.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): Does my right hon. Friend accept that since the war two principles have successfully guided NATO foreign policy—the doctrine of the deterrent, and recognition that sanctions generally are not very effective in bringing about a result quickly? Will my right hon. Friend accept that some of us find it difficult to understand why those two principles have not been more in evidence in the last 18 months? Will he now make it quite plain that Serbia knows that they are in evidence now?

Mr. Hurd: My hon. Friend's points are well taken. Of course we know the track record for sanctions. It shows that a country can be substantially weakened but that sanctions do not automatically bring about a change of policy. I think that is a fair statement. If one considers Serbia's location on the map and its needs, one finds that Serbia is vulnerable to sanctions—but sanctions must be enforced before that can be true. I return to the point made by the right hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham). Enforcement has started and has already caused substantial difficulty and ruinous inflation to Serbia. That must now be carried forward.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): Do none of the second-rate Ministers in this third-rate Administration realise that their spunklessness in backing the Vance-Owen plan, which is hopeless and now dead, and in pursuing the ineffectiveness of sanctions, which the Foreign Secretary is still bumbling on about, has led to the death of thousands upon thousands of Bosnian Muslims who have not had the weapons to defend themselves? Will the Prime Minister now work with his US and EC colleagues to introduce terms which actually stop Serb aggression, by bombing their communications, their lines of supply, their airfields and the arms factories that are supplying them, before thousands more die in this exercise of ethnic cleansing in greater Serbia and before the war spreads to Kosovo and Macedonia?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman does not take into account the points that I made about the effectiveness of bombing. It is all very well for him, in that stentorian tone, to make those eloquent phrases. We have to be sure, the House has to be sure, before we go down that path, that the result will be the saving of lives and an improvement in the position. Those who advocate that kind of wholesale approach produce no evidence to that effect. Our advice is the other way. We have to take it into account.

I am not saying—the hon. Gentleman will give me credit for this—that we can sit back and suppose that existing policies are sufficient. They obviously have not been sufficient to change the policies of the Bosnian Serbs and the Serbs, but in looking for ways of strengthening them, which is what we have to do, we have to take into account the probabilities and look ahead, as I have said, not just to the satisfactions of tomorrow but to where we would be in five or six months' time, or in two or three years' time, if we went down the path that the hon. Gentleman advocates.

Sir Cranley Onslow (Woking): Does my right hon. Friend agree that one of the great achievements of the presence of United Nations troops is not just the bringing in of food and medicine or the evacuation of the sick and wounded but the prevention of even worse massacres than have already taken place, whether they be in Srebrenica, Sarajevo or elsewhere, and that it is very important to remember that fact?

My right hon. Friend speaks, choosing his words with care, of savages in eastern Bosnia. Can he assure the House that the United Nations is taking every possible step to collect evidence against those savages so that they can eventually be brought to book for the crimes that they are committing?

Mr. Hurd: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend's first point—and, indeed, with his second; yes, indeed, the Security Council has given its view on that. Evidence is being collected. I hope that it will not be too long before the necessary international criminal jurisdiction comes into being.

Mr. James Molyneaux (Lagan Valley): Would not those who are pressing Her Majesty's Government to take spectacular action of the kind recommended by the news industry be wise to heed the words of Lord Healey, who had battlefield experience, and who fully understands the meaning of the maxim that no military plan survives contact with the enemy?

Mr. Hurd: I did not hear Lord Healey. There will be continuing discussion of all these options. No one can be so satisfied with the present situation or the present policies that they can say, definitely and for ever, that those kinds of option will always be rejected. I want to make that clear to the House. But the right hon. Gentleman is right. Before one goes down this route, one has to be sure, out of experience and as a result of professional advice, that the result will be a helpful one.

Mr. Michael Ancram (Devizes): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the situation in Bosnia is anything but simple and that, although Serbs are committing appalling atrocities against Muslims, at the same time Muslims and Croats are committing appalling atrocities against each other, sometimes under the nose of the British forces? Does my right hon. Friend therefore agree that our response should ultimately be based on a balance of moral imperatives and that, while positive military intervention might, in the short term, prevent some of the atrocities taking place, in the longer term it could threaten a wider and even bloodier civil war throughout the region and that it should be considered only as a last resort?

Mr. Hurd: My hon. Friend has the balance quite right. We must take account of events where the cameras are not. The heaviest fighting in the past day or so has been between Muslims and Croats. This is very relevant to the suggestion that the arms embargo should be partly lifted; we must take that into account. We must take into account the very fragile situation in Croatia where a truce is just holding and where the UN forces are in substantial operational difficulty. Those are the kinds of thing that do not come into the headlines or into the news bulletins day after day and night after night, but they are part of the total picture. If we took action to deal with the situation where the television is which then upset or destroyed the chances of peace in the other areas, we should be severely to blame.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): Is the Foreign Secretary aware that the media coverage of the atrocities has aroused much of the pressure for further action which has been expressed today? Of course all wars, especially civil wars, include atrocities on a massive scale, not all of which are equally covered. Is he also aware that the world community, the United Nations and the western nations must decide quite clearly at the beginning whether they can hope to lift the arms embargo, to supply arms or to become combatants themselves by air strikes or ground strikes and to maintain their role as peace-makers and agents of humanitarian relief? If the principles advocated today in the House by some hon. Members were applied to the Palestinian question, for example, the logic of what was proposed would become clearer.

Will the Foreign Secretary give the House an assurance that before long we shall have a debate in which the complexities, dangers, difficulties and agonies of the situation can be fully explored in a way that is not possible by questions?

Mr. Hurd: I personally would be in favour of that. It is not long since we had a debate on Yugoslavia, but, as the right hon. Gentleman exactly says, the issues are extremely complicated. I thought that his analysis at the beginning was right. The UN now has a humanitarian role. Massacres are being prevented and people who would otherwise die are being kept alive because of what the UN is now doing. That is not the total answer, but before that is put at risk in the search for the total answer, the balance must be struck. Each proposal for helping towards peace with justice must be tested against the risk that it would impose on the UN and the humanitarian agencies, and on what they are already doing. As the right hon. Gentleman says, striking that balance is an essential part of getting the decisions right.

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey and Waterside): Will my right hon. Friend acknowledge that there are two wars in Bosnia? There is a three-sided civil war, and there is the invasion of the sovereign state of Bosnia by Serbia. Will he acknowledge that Serbia has enough weapons and munitions to fight a full-scale war for at least two years and that the only action that will stop the wheels of war turning is a full-scale and properly enforced blockade of Serbia?

Some of us find it a little difficult to stomach the fact that, while President Yeltsin puts out one hand to receive £28 billion-worth of aid from the west, with the other hand he is still giving assistance to Serbia. If sanctions and the blockade are to work, the umbilical cord between Moscow and Belgrade must be cut.

Mr. Hurd: The Russian Government are severely criticised at home for the co-operation that they have undertaken with western Governments with regard to the former Yugoslavia, and that criticism comes at an especially sensitive time. Nevertheless, with some difficulty and after many meetings, as I have said and as my hon. Friend knows, the Russians acquiesced to the very severe sanctions resolution, amounting to a blockade. The consequences must follow, as my hon. Friend has rightly pointed out. We must build on that Russian acquiescence and ensure that Russian oil, Russian services, Russian goods and, above all, Russian arms do not reach the Serbs and the Bosnian Serbs in contravention of those resolutions.

Ms Angela Eagle (Wallasey): Will the Foreign Secretary explain why sanctions were not thought to be appropriate or workable for South Africa, yet they are workable in a much more immediate and urgent case in Serbia? Will he explain by what mechanisms his announcement today will bring the Serbs in Bosnia to the negotiating table, given that, in effect, they are taking all that they want by their actions on the ground? Is it not the case that they will come to the negotiating table only once they have all that they want—the greater Serbia? Finally, will the right hon. Gentleman give his opinion on an idea that worked to protect the Kurds in Iraq: how about safe havens for the Bosnian Muslims?

Mr. Hurd: Each case is different. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] That is obviously true. In South Africa, the question was how we moved the South Africans away from apartheid. The Government's predecessors did not feel that economic sanctions were the best way of doing that. I think that events probably showed that we were right. South Africa has moved away from apartheid; but I do not want to reopen that argument now. Serbia is a different case. What we are trying to achieve is different and the country is different. I believe that, if there is effective enforcement—and it is certainly an "if"—sanctions can help to achieve a change of policy.

The hon. Lady asked about safe havens. The establishment of safe havens would involve fighting one's way in to create the safety. That did not arise in north Iraq because, at that time, for a short time, there was a vacuum. We managed to move in and save a great many lives. The situation is not the same in Serbia. There is civil war between the three communities, and very few parts of the country are not involved in that war. There is also the help from Serbia. I do not believe that the concept of safe havens would be workable.

On the hon. Lady's main point, it is perfectly true that the Serbs and the Bosnian Serbs have grabbed slices of territory—more ground than was allocated to them, for example, under the Vance-Owen plan—but the position is not secure or stable or accepted. There comes a time when people are no longer concerned with physical possession alone; they want a life for themselves and their children. They want stability and acceptance. That option is not open to the Serbs. There comes a time, as I said, when people begin to think about their own future and that of their children. The present methods will not ensure that for the Serbs.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): Will my right hon. Friend explain what is the British national interest in Bosnia? Will he please explain what distinguishes the horrible war in Bosnia from the many other equally horrible wars occurring throughout the world? Is it not only the British national interest that can justify our intervention in any such wars?

Mr. Hurd: Yes, certainly, it is the British national interest that justifies or does not justify our becoming involved in what amounts to a considerable number of tragedies and disasters. We have come to the view that it is a British national interest that we should do what we can to help bring peace to Bosnia and the former Yugoslavia, partly because the conflict is in Europe, whereas the other conflicts are not, and partly because we have been able to see a way in which we can do that. The presence of the Cheshires, and the saving of lives by the RAF, our civilian drivers and our humanitarian escorts have been good. That is something that we have accomplished, which we could not accomplish in Nagorno-Karabakh, for example. What we have done is entirely justified according to my hon. Friend's criterion, which is the British national interest.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Is the Foreign Secretary aware that one of the reasons why much of the population is clamouring for the British Government to do something is that, only a couple of years ago, they managed to do it in the Gulf? People think that that can be repeated over and over again, notwithstanding the fact that there are 25 conflicts taking place around the world.

The other problem is that the conflict is taking place in the European arena. The Common Market, led by Germany, decided to go along with the partition of the former Yugoslavia. It agreed to recognise Croatia and subsequently Bosnia. The British Government—and the Foreign Secretary himself—were against that initially, but they were carried along by the Germans. They did a deal with Kohl on the opt-out at Maastricht; it was a quid pro quo. The Government have now made a rod for their own back and they do not know what to do about it. Let me tell people like those on the Liberal Democrat Benches, who want to fight the war with the blood of other people's kids: do it yourselves. If they do not have the guts to put on their own flak jackets, they should not ask me to call on other kids to spill their blood to resolve what is a civil conflict in Yugoslavia as a result of the efforts of the Common Market.

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman seeks to bring the treaty of Maastricht into just about every intervention on every subject. There was no trade-off of that kind. I do not believe that even the hon. Gentleman believes that it would have been right to have held back from recognising the reality of Slovenia and Croatia much longer than we did. We can argue about the timing, as I have said before. We were criticised by many people, such as my right hon. and noble Friend Baroness Thatcher, for not recognising much sooner when the Germans wanted to. We struck a balance about timing, and I do not think that we could or should have postponed it much longer.

Sir Giles Shaw (Pudsey): Will my right hon. Friend accept that many of us in the House are grateful for the fact that he is keeping his head when many around him may be losing theirs—including those with coronets on? Will he also give us some comfort in relation to whether the United Nations is fully equipped to deal with the scale of the humanitarian problem that is now evolving? Are there now sufficient funds and sufficient humanitarian aid available to deal with the scale of what is now unfolding in Bosnia? If there are not, what sanctions will be placed on those members who have not paid?

Mr. Hurd: There are certainly shortages of food, rather than of money, in the supplies needed to keep the humanitarian effort going. The money has been voted, but getting the food into the right place at the right time has sometimes proved to be more difficult. My hon. Friend the Member for Pudsey (Sir G. Shaw) is entirely right about that. As far as Europe is concerned, the European Community is the biggest donor. We are on at the Commission all the time to ensure that the stores and supplies are where they are actually needed.

Mr. Jim Marshall (Leicester, South): Does the Foreign Secretary accept that the apparently even-handed approach to the arms embargo is, in effect, playing to the territorial ambitions of the Serbs and, to a lesser degree, the Croats? In the absence of resolve by the west to intervene, or as the west has been unable or unwilling to intervene, will the Bosnian Government be able to defend their own citizens and territory only through the availability of arms? The Serbs and the Croats will still get the arms, but the Bosnian Government do not have the arms. In the interests of the sovereignty of Bosnia and of preserving the lives of the citizens of Bosnia, it is essential that the total arms embargo on the former Yugoslavia should be lifted.

Mr. Hurd: The total arms embargo or just for the Bosnian Muslims? That is the point. Muslims and Croats were fighting each other in Vitez today. Under the hon. Gentleman's policy, both would be resupplied with arms. Is that really sensible, particularly if the result is that we have to withdraw our troops and stop the humanitarian effort? The logic of what the hon. Gentleman says obviously has a very wide appeal, particularly in the United States. We may have to consider this, and I am not ruling it out for ever in certain forms. However, before we decide, and before there is any acquiesence in that, we would have to sort out the balance and that is precisely the balance that the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) was arguing a few minutes ago.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): May I tell my right hon. Friend how right he is not to seek dramatic instant solutions to this most intractable and tragic conflict? Will he bear in mind that the Serbs and other protagonists to the warfare not only practised partisan warfare in world war two, but have also trained for it in the Yugoslav national army for decades thereafter? Could he at least ensure that the humanitarian effort which Her Majesty's Government are rightly applying is well administered, that they make clear to the French Administration the need for a good replacement for General Morillon, who has commanded universal respect, and that, if no good French general is forthcoming, we will be prepared and willing to offer a general officer commanding from the British Army?

Mr. Hurd: The news yesterday was that General Morillon is continuing for the time being. Of course, he is properly supported by our own officers. I agree with my hon. Friend's point about the humanitarian effort. In view of all that has been happening, it would be absurd to deny or pretend to palliate the conduct of Serbs and Bosnian Serbs because of the history of world war two. In most people's minds, what the Serbs have done in recent months has obliterated a good deal of the heroism with which they were associated at that time.

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): What discussions have the Government, the European Community and the United Nations had with the Serbs, Croats and Muslims who have been opposed all along to military activity by people involving their own side, especially the Serbs? Is it the case that discussions take place only with the warlords and the paramilitaries? Should such discussions also involve others? We should examine some of their ideas about the way forward.

Mr. Hurd: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. When I went to Belgrade last summer I had exactly such discussions with the opposition—I am sure that many hon. and right hon. Members would do the same. It is entirely right to keep in touch with the widest possible range of opinion in all the republics.

Mr. Anthony Coombs (Wyre Forest): While supporting the Government's reluctance to commit ground troops and inflame the situation by arming the Bosnian Muslims, can my right hon. Friend confirm that sanctions have already led to a 40 per cent. reduction in the gross national product in Serbia—that was the figure given by the Secretary of State for Defence last week—with precious little effect on the ability of the Serbs to prosecute the war? How does the world community envisage making these sanctions effective? What sort of leverage can be put against the Russians to ensure that they do not turn a blind eye to sanctions breaking?

Mr. Hurd: The Russians have shown themselves to be open to persuasion on these matters in the past few weeks, and that needs to continue. Existing sanctions have done substantial harm to the Serb economy without changing the basic policy. We hope—the recent resolution is designed to achieve this—to convert that pressure and the harm which has already been done to the economy into a virtual blockade that will bring about the change.

Mr. Peter Hain (Neath): No one would deny that any solution is risk-free or without danger. Why is the Foreign Secretary not pressing the United Nations to use its air resources in the area to target Serbian supply lines, artillery, mortar and tank positions? The policy pursued by his Government and the whole of the west has failed abysmally. The genocide, rape and ethnic cleansing continue and, increasingly, the Government are speaking with the voice of Joseph Chamberlain on this crisis.

Mr. Hurd: I think that the hon. Gentleman has got his Chamberlains mixed up.

Mr. Hain: Neville Chamberlain.

Mr. Hurd: I am obliged.

I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman was in the Chamber when I made my statement. Before one goes down the path of the sort of military activity—the air strikes which he mentioned—that goes well beyond what was advocated by the Labour Front Bench, one must have a reasonable judgment that the result will be a good one. At present, that judgment is not there. The immediate effect is to kill more people, including civilians. That is what the hon. Gentleman had in mind when he said that it was not "risk-free". One must be clear that the circumstances and proposals are such that that immediate effect is likely to be counterbalanced by an eventual good.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): Can my right hon. Friend confirm that the Royal Air Force crews which will be engaged in policing the no-fly zone area will have the same protection as that which they enjoyed when patrolling over Iraq? In other words, any surface-to-air missiles or radar that lock on will be hit and attacked. If that is so, is it recognised that that in itself could lead to an escalation of the military conflict?

Will my right hon. Friend also bear in mind when discussing the matter with his colleagues that Muslim communities throughout the world are looking at what is happening in the former Yugoslavia and may well be given a holy jihad to fight at some future date based on whatever is the outcome of this ghastly mess?

Mr. Hurd: I need to check on my hon. Friend's first point. I understand its importance and I would not want to mislead him with an immediate answer which might not be accurate if I were to volunteer it.

On his second point—which I think also moved the hon. Member for Warley, East (Mr. Faulds)—it is of course true that the frustration and anger that we feel at what is happening in Bosnia is, if anything, more intense in the Muslim world. I can understand that. However, the way in which Muslims have expressed that frustration and anger has been constructive. There has been little of the destructive vehemence which my hon. Friend fears.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): Does the Foreign Secretary recall that in a speech on Saturday he said:

"In the context of Europe, our differences are our lifeblood"?

That is a statement which lies uneasily with those of us who are witnessing what many people call ethnic cleansing but which many of us would call genocide in certain areas of the former Yugoslavia.

Does the right hon. Gentleman also recall that in that speech he laid great emphasis on the importance of sovereign states in the context of international law? That is a matter which weighed heavily on Members of Parliament during the Iraq and Kuwait conflict. It is therefore inappropriate for Members to refer to the current events in the former Yugoslavia as a civil war because we are seeing imperial aggression between sovereign states.

Against the background of what happened in Kuwait and Iraq, where there was a clear commitment to defend a sovereign state, why are we not prepared to make the same commitment in the former Yugoslavia? Why are we not prepared to issue a clear ultimatum to the Serbs that, unless they abide by the clear principles which underpin international law, we shall take action and, in particular, launch air strikes against their supply stations?

Mr. Hurd: The aggression of Iraq against Kuwait was a simple act of aggression by one sovereign state against another. In Bosnia, we have a war in which the overwhelming majority of those fighting are Bosnians—Bosnian Serbs, Bosnian Croats and Bosnian Muslims. It was initiated and is sustained with help from Belgrade. That is why the trade sanctions and the sanctions announced last Saturday night are directed solely against Serbia and related Montenegro. But the position is different from that which produced Desert Storm.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): Will my right hon. Friend take an early opportunity to impress on President Tudjman of Croatia that, while we sympathise greatly with what the Croatian people had to put up with at the hands of the Serbs, the Vance-Owen plan envisages a federal Bosnia with individual cantons and not the annexation of the Croatian cantons by Croatia?

Mr. Hurd: My hon. Friend is right. In principle, the Government of Croatia accept that.

Mr. George Galloway (Glasgow, Hillhead): Notwithstanding the gibes about the news industry that have been made by hon. Members on both sides of the House, the Foreign Secretary should be warned that the impression that there is a consensus of complacency while genocide goes on is strong among the people of Britain. The political leadership on both sides of the House of Commons should take that on board.

May I ask the Foreign Secretary the question which my Muslim constituents are asking me and Muslims around the world are asking all the Governments of the west: how can it be that economic sanctions could be drawn so tightly around Iraq that hundreds of thousands of weak, vulnerable, young and old people have died for the want of food and medicine and the wherewithal to keep them alive, yet in almost two years it has not been possible to bring sanctions to bear against Serbia which would halt the aggression? Why was it possible for the Governments of the west to expend treasures in billions and billions of dollars and to move the armies, navies and air forces of the world to pulverise Iraq into obeying international law, and yet nightly we watch on our television screens the Serbian-supplied Bosnian Serb forces committing acts of genocide against Muslims in Bosnia? What is the answer to this glaring, brazen contradiction?

Mr. Hurd: I hope that the hon. Gentleman is not telling his constituents that sanctions against Iraq prevent food and medicine from reaching that country. He knows that that is not so and that food and medicine are precisely excluded from the sanctions. There is a very substantial United Nations humanitarian effort in all parts of Iraq.

I tried to answer the point about the difference between what happened with Kuwait and Iraq and what is happening in Yugoslavia when I answered the question of the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing). They are entirely different situations.

The hon. Gentleman is right about the anger and frustration—I do not contradict his first sentence at all. That is the mood at the moment. If we were to be entirely complacent in response to that, he would be right in his criticism. If we were to take measures simply to deal with that sense of anger and frustration—which, in our better judgment, in five or six months' time would have made the situation worse, or no better—we would quite rightly be facing a different kind of anger and frustration. We would have neglected our job of bringing the best judgment that we can to bear on getting these matters right.

Mr. Tim Renton (Mid-Sussex): Further to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Pudsey (Sir G. Shaw), in this interim period, while my right hon. Friend looks wisely and cautiously at whether other options should be exercised, will he look at the ability of the international organisations to deal with the vast increase in the number of refugees? Will he, for instance, look at what is happening to aid which is going to refugee camps for Bosnians in Croatia? I understand that the Croatians have already closed some of the Bosnian refugee camps in their country and that they are dispersing the Bosnian refugees, the Muslims, either to notional camps or sending them closer to the fighting lines. That needs looking at at this stage.

Mr. Hurd: I think my right hon. Friend must be right. I am not familiar with the details, but if he would like to amplify what he has said I will make sure that it receives urgent consideration.

Several hon. Members rose——

Madam Speaker: We must now move on.

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: I have a Standing Order No. 20 application to hear first from the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden).

4.32 pm

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): I wish to apply, under Standing Order No. 20, to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the policy of Her Majesty's Government in relation to the future of Bosnia."

I think that the tragic events unfolding in Bosnia in recent days, reinforced by the exchanges that we have just heard on the statement, self-evidently meet the criteria of Standing Order No. 20. I will therefore put this application simply. When, in God's name, are the elected representatives of the people of Britain to be given a full and proper opportunity to discuss in the House of Commons the evil genocide, murder and systematic rapes which are part of the unmitigated aggression of Serbia? When will the House be given an opportunity to speak for the people of Britain on the biggest crisis facing Europe since the end of the second world war?

Madam Speaker: I have listened carefully to what the hon. Gentleman has said. As he knows, I have to announce my decision without giving my reasons for it. I do not consider that the matter that he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 20. Therefore, I cannot submit his application to the House.

Points of Order

4.35 pm

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I seek your guidance about an article that appeared in The Guardian today in which the hon. Member for Neath (Mr. Hain)—who has left his place, despite the fact that I notified him that I would mention the matter to you—deliberately sought to link me to the assassination in South Africa of Mr. Chris Hani, an incident that I utterly deplore. The hon. Gentleman has not a shred of evidence, but alleged in The Guardian that he was already making complaints about the matter in the House through the proper authorities. Will she advise me as to how the matter can be dealt with under our Standing Orders and what she is prepared to do about the conduct of the hon. Member for Neath, who has previously made allegations—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady is referring to a "she". Who is "she"?

Mrs. Gorman: No, I am not. I am referring to the hon. Member for Neath. I said that he was not in his place, but he has since returned. Without having a shred of evidence for doing so, the hon. Member alleged in The Guardian today that I am linked with the assassination of Mr. Chris Hani in South Africa. It is also reported in The Guardian that the hon. Gentleman is raising the matter in the House with the relevant authorities. Will she—meaning yourself, Madam Speaker—advise me on how the matter can be dealt with and how the hon. Member for Neath can be reprimanded for his discreditable conduct?

Madam Speaker: Does the hon. Member for Neath (Mr. Hain) wish to make a point of order in response?

Mr. Peter Hain (Neath): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. I have made no allegations against the hon. Lady, who is being extremely misleading in making that suggestion. I said that there is evidence, reported in both The Independent and The Guardian, of links between the Conservatives and the Western Goals Institute and the Conservative party in South Africa—one of whose ex-Members of Parliament and leaders has been charged in connection with the Hani assassination. The Prime Minister needs to get to the bottom of the matter, and the hon. Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) is seeking to obfuscate the matter.

Madam Speaker: Thankfully, I have no responsibililty for what one Member of Parliament says about another. The hon. Members must sort it out among themselves.

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the decision that you have just taken on the Standing Order No. 20 application of my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden), but you would probably agree that, in view of on-going events, there is need for an urgent debate on Yugoslavia. Through your good offices, Madam Speaker, would you ask the Government—I see that Ministers from the Foreign Office are present—to ensure that there is in the House a full debate, not merely questions, on the subject at an early opportunity?

Madam Speaker: The hon. Gentleman is trying to use the Chair of the House to put questions that are not relevant now. As he knows, the business of the House has nothing whatever to do with the Speaker. I have let the statement run for quite a long time today, and I have deliberately sought to call every hon. Member who was disappointed last week during the statement. I keep accurate records and, with one exception, I have been able to call every hon. Member who was disappointed last week. I hope that the House will help me to keep up what I consider to be a reasonably high standard.

Orders of the Day

European Communities (Amendment) Bill

Considered in Committee [Progress, 15 April]

[MR. MICHAEL MORRIS in the Chair]

4.39 pm

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Michael Morris): In view of the character of the Bill before the Committee and the views expressed by hon. Members, both in the Chamber and privately, in connection with amendment No. 27, I think it right to make a further statement about the context in which my decision not to allow a separate Division on amendment No. 27 was taken.

In arriving at such a decision on an amendment, any occupant of the Chair must have regard to a number of factors, including the Committee's debates, the clarity or effect of an amendment, and its impact on the Bill which, if brought into effect, must be both workable and understandable. In the very nature of this case, there can be no exact precedent.

Amendment No. 27 deals with certain aspects of the United Kingdom's position with regard to the agreement annexed to the protocol on social policy. So do new clauses 74 and 75. After lengthy representations from the hon. Members concerned, I have decided that I should not alter my decision on amendment No. 27, but that further debate on the social protocol, which the Committee is to have, should be led by new clause 74, with which new clause 75 will be grouped.

I remind the Committee that I am prepared, at the appropriate time, to permit separate Divisions on amendments Nos. 225, 268, 426 and 420.

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. I am grateful for the further consideration that you have given to this very important issue, and for your courtesy in making considerable time available for us to meet you to discuss the whole nexus of issues.

I cannot, however, let this occasion go by without saying that the Opposition have not changed their views about the significance of amendment No. 27, and nothing in what you have said today convinces me that we should change it. As I have made clear many times, amendment No. 27 is in order; it has been debated; and there remains no valid reason for not allowing the Committee to vote on it.

I do not wish to sound churlish when I say that we should express some gratitude to you, Mr. Morris, for accepting a vote on new clause 74, in respect of which my argument is the same as it was for new clause 75. I do not regard new clause 74 as an alternative to amendment No. 27, nor do I believe that it can be reasonably or realistically posed in those terms.

Last week, I asked for time for further consideration, and you were good enough to agree to that. I do not propose to pursue this matter indefinitely, but I want to make two further points about this decision. The first is to do with the Government's statement last week about accepting new clause 75.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office wrote on 5 April to the Local Government International Bureau expressing a view about the Government's attitude to the amendment carried by the Committee in respect of the Committee of the Regions. In his letter to Mr. Dickson-Smith, the Minister of State said:

> "No final decisions have yet been taken either on the allocation of seats between the different parts of the United Kingdom or on what sort of representation should be nominated to the Committee."

But the House of Commons has taken a decision on that matter; by a significant majority, it voted in favour of a particular method of allocating the seats.

In this letter, we have something similar to what I accused the Government of last Thursday—a clear, and in this case quite unequivocal, sign from the Government that they may not accept the will of the House in this matter. The Minister of State denied my charge in respect of the Government briefing on new clause 75. He cannot deny what he has personally written to the people making representations to him from the Local Government International Bureau.

Secondly, I refer you, Mr. Morris, to column 685 in the Official Report of 22 February 1993, when you said:

> "We are some way off a vote on amendment No. 27".—[Official Report, 22 February 1993; Vol. 219, c. 685.]

The implication of your statement then is clear: that the Committee would have a vote on amendment No. 27. I remain completely unconvinced by the arguments against such a vote taking place, and I repeat what I said last week —that we shall take our unanswerable case to the Speaker, for this matter to be determined on Report.

Several hon. Members rose——

The Chairman: Order. I should like to respond to the right hon. Gentleman. First, I request that he study with care the words that I have spoken this afternoon, which I accept he has not heard before. He will want to reflect on them.

Secondly, the right hon. Gentleman will know that the selection of amendments and the votes flowing from them are always provisional—that is what it says at the top of the Notice Paper.

Thirdly, new clause 74 will lead the debate, so it is the whole basis of that debate, and I therefore think it has a higher standing than the right hon. Gentleman has provisionally said it would have.

With regard to the Committee of the Regions, the right hon. Gentleman is right to remind the Committee that all Members of the House are bound by any Act of Parliament and the matters that flow from it.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Further to that point of order, Mr. Morris. I thank you for what you have said today. Will you clarify for my constituents whether having a debate on new clause 74 will mean that the protocol which fixes this new tax will probably be considered after ratification of the treaty, not before it, as would happen with amendment No. 27?

The Chairman: The hon. Gentleman has been in the House long enough to know that he should read the amendment and put his own interpretation on it.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): Further to that point of order, Mr. Morris. You quite properly said on Thursday, and you have repeated today, that the House has entrusted you, as Chairman of Ways and Means, with a responsibility for determining whether amendments will be called or voted upon, and that you are not obliged to give your reasons. But you will also be aware that the Government have laid great emphasis throughout the debate on the fact that this Bill is to be considered by the procedures of parliamentary democracy.

Of course, it is open to the House to appeal against a ruling in the usual manner—by putting down a motion regretting the decision reached by the Chairman of Ways and Means. That is in no way personal; it is comparable to an appeal to the High Court when a lower court reaches a view that is not accepted by the litigants.

Because this is a matter of enormous procedural importance, quite apart from the merits of the Bill, if this judgment remains, "Erskine May" in all future editions will entrust to future Chairmen of Committees the right to disallow votes on amendments which they do not believe merit a vote. In this case, the social protocol was considered of such importance that the Government highlighted their requirement for an opt-out at the Maastricht treaty negotiations, so from their point of view it could hardly be a more important issue—whereas you have said that, in your judgment, it is not an important issue. That also raises certain consequences.

As you know, Mr. Morris, I have told your office—the Public Bill Office—that I am minded to table such a motion. If a motion of this kind is tabled, may I take it that you would not feel able to take the Chair of the Committee until the matter was resolved? It has long been the practice of the House that, when a motion commenting on the Chair is on the Order Paper, the Chairman concerned does not sit until the court of appeal—in this case the House as a whole—has met.

I should be grateful if you would advise me on that, because this is a matter of fundamental importance, and I have a feeling that, when we read the statement that you have made this afternoon about the basis on which amendments are selected—that they must be clear and that you must know their effect on the Bill—it may turn out to be equally important. It has never been my understanding that the Chairman had any responsibility for considering either the intelligibility of an amendment or, for that matter, its effect if introduced to legislation.

For all these reasons, I hope, Mr. Morris, that you will appreciate that this relates not to yourself but to the procedures of the House concerning this Bill and all future legislation.

The Chairman: I note what the right hon. Gentleman says.

Mr. Tim Renton (Mid-Sussex): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. I have not spoken for as long on this important Bill as many hon. Members who are in the Committee. That is why I find it somewhat surprising that even such an expert on parliamentary affairs as the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) has such great difficulty with the fact that, having ruled out of order amendment No. 27, you have decided that there should be not only a vote on new clause 74 but a debate. I listened carefully to your words.

Sir Teddy Taylor: After ratification—that is the difference.

Mr. Renton: I suggest that my hon. Friend does not interrupt. His interruptions have become a little— [Interruption.]

The Chairman: Order. Points of order are matters for the Chair and not matters for debate in Committee one way or the other.

Mr. Renton: I have read new clause 74, which is what you suggested my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) should do, Mr. Morris. It is absolutely clear that there will be a debate on the principle whether to adopt the protocol on social policy. The new clause is not narrowly worded; it is very broad. It clearly states:

"This Act shall come into force only when the House of Commons has come to a Resolution on a motion tabled by a Minister of the Crown".

I look forward to that debate, which will be interesting and wide-ranging.

Several hon. Members rose——

The Chairman: Order. I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman, but we cannot have a debate now on new clause 74 and its interpretation. That is why I suggested to the right hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) that he should read and interpret the new clause in the way that he felt was right.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Further to the point of order by my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), Mr. Morris. I underline what my right hon. Friend said about dealing with procedure rather than personality. You may recall that one of your esteemed predecessors, Sir Robert Grant-Ferris, was in your position in 1972 and made a selection of amendments on which there were points of order for 15 hours. He had to sustain a debate of the type that my right hon. Friend mentioned, but the affection and esteem in which he was held in Parliament was unaffected, although the procedure was important.

We are grateful for your announcement, Mr. Morris. On Thursday you said that, after the debate on which we were about to embark on amendment No. 52, there would be votes on amendment No. 225, if it was pressed, and on amendment No. 268 before the debate on clause 1 stand part. Earlier today, you mentioned amendment No. 426. Will that be debated before clause 1 stand part?

You mentioned matters that have to be borne in mind on selection. As hon. Members know, under Standing Order No. 20, the Speaker must take certain factors into account, but gives no reasons. The factors that you mentioned bear positively, if I may put it like that, on your ruling. Can you direct the Committee to other factors contained in another source, either by reference to a book or immediately?

You said that the matter was unprecedented, and we all agree with that. What is also unprecedented is that an amendment was selected and debated and the closure was moved. You would not have accepted the closure if the debate had not been thorough. Because of the timing, you have said that the Committee shall not come to a decision. Therefore, the historic basis of selection, motion, debate and question has been broken, because there has been no decision. If the ruling is not changed by some means, that is also unprecedented, and gives rise to great anxiety among certain hon. Members.

Several hon. Members rose——

The Chairman: Order. I shall clarify the matter. Amendment No. 426, if it is moved, will warrant a separate Division before the debate on clause 1 stand part. I hope that the Committee is clear on that. I am grateful that the hon. Gentleman listened with care to the words in my second paragraph, because my statement was important and merits study. The statement guides me and the Committee, because it makes it plain that, every day we meet, the provisional selection of amendments is a matter for the Chairman. That provides for the Chairman to change his selection between one sitting day and the next. Events may cause such a change to take place.

Sir Peter Emery (Honiton): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. I have two questions.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): You rang, m'lord?

Sir Peter Emery: Is that what the hon. Gentleman wants?

When a group of amendments is tabled for debate, it is not unknown for an hon. Member to ask for a Division on an amendment that had not previously been annotated for a Division. It is entirely up to the Chair to decide on a Division. It has been suggested that the Chairman does not decide on whether to grant a Divison, but that is obviously incorrect, because such power has always rested with the Chairman.

Secondly, if, as the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) suggested, there is to be a substantive motion, surely it would be right to proceed with the debate and have no more points of order on the selection of amendments.

Several hon. Members rose——

The Chairman: Order. I confirm the right hon. Gentleman's first point, and I am grateful to him for making it. I have no comment on his second point.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. Members of the Committee will have noticed that you have accepted for debate some amendments to the new clauses about a referendum, which make the link between consulting the people on the Maastricht process and consulting them on the social protocol. The hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson), who is in his place, is quoted in today's issue of The Scotsman as saying that these amendments have "no chance of being debated or accepted."

That has turned out to be a bad short-term forecast, because, as we see from the selection paper, they have been selected for debate. [Interruption.] I understand why the hon. Member for Hamilton is getting rather upset. His fig leaf for not supporting a referendum on Maastricht is starting to be removed. In view of that statement, Mr. Morris, will you confirm that the choice of matters for debate is made not by the Government or the Opposition, but by you alone?

The Chairman: I certainly confirm that. The thrust of the hon. Gentleman's point of order proves that selection is always provisional.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. Some days ago and today, you ruled that the Bill's effect is one criterion that you take into account, and that you also take account of its clarity. Without referring specifically to a television programme of which I have a transcript, you reinforce that by suggesting—quite rightly, I understand—that you would not want to see the Bill wrecked.

That brings us to the significance of Second Reading. If the Bill's principle is one of your prime considerations in referring to its effect, will you bear in mind the fact that, on Second Reading on 2 May last year, almost a year ago, the Danish referendum, which significantly changed the nature of the treaty signed on 7 February, had not been held?

Secondly, the question of economic and monetary union lies at the heart of the principle of the Bill. As the Government have withdrawn from the exchange rate mechanism, considering the basis of the Second Reading debate, surely we should not be excluded from consideration of whether to allow amendment No. 27. Do you agree, Mr. Morris?

The Chairman: No.

5 pm

Mr. Bryan Gould (Dagenham): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. You will recall that, on Thursday, I suggested that your ruling on amendment No. 27 might well be opposed by a majority of the Committee; I asked how such a majority could make its view known and expect it to prevail. In the event, you accepted the motion moved by my right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) to allow the Committee a cooling-off period. I assume that it was hoped that, during that period, you and others might have second and better thoughts.

Nearly every hon. Member who spoke in Thursday's debate endorsed the need for a cooling-off period, and expressed the hope that a different view would be taken after it. The fact that the motion was accepted without a Division strongly supports my view that a majority of the Committee does not agree with your ruling, Mr. Morris. May I ask to what extent you took account of the sequence of events—that is, the debate and its outcome—when you drafted the statement that you have read out today?

The Chairman: Let me make two points. First, as I was in the Chair for the whole of what the right hon. Gentleman describes as a cooling-off period, it was not a particularly cool time for me. Secondly, I must and do take every factor into consideration, but at the end of the day the buck stops here: I have to choose the amendments.

Mr. Michael Spicer (Worcestershire, South): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. When my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) expressed anxiety about how he would explain the effect of your decision about amendment No. 27 to his constituents, you said that he must make up his own mind about the impact of the Bill —he had been here long enough to do so. Earlier, in your statement, you said that the impact on the Bill was one of the criteria on which you decided whether to select an amendment for a vote. Will you tell us a little more about the possible impact of new clause 74? For instance, if a vote on it had the effect of excluding the social chapter——

The Chairman: Order. I do not wish to amplify anything that I have already said; I hope that the hon. Gentleman listened very carefully to what I said in my statement.

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. I am grateful for your statement, and will give it the careful study for which you asked. I was, however, disappointed that you stuck to your decision not to call amendment No. 27.

My point of order relates to some extent to what was said by the hon. Member for Worcestershire, South (Mr. Spicer). Although you were not obliged to do so, you explained some of the factors that had influenced your decision, one of which was the effect of an amendment on the Bill. Surely this is the crux of the matter. The effects of different amendments are entirely different: amendment No. 27 would deliver a major blow to the Bill—indeed, it would destroy it, which would please me personally—while new clauses 74 and 75 are entirely acceptable to the Government, because they will have no effect on the Bill or the treaty. We want to vote on amendments that are relevant to the Bill, and have some meaning.

The Chairman: The guidance that I have given this afternoon is very general, and can be applied to any and every amendment.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. This is an entirely separate point of order. May I turn your attention to new clause 80, which is entitled "Transferred Powers (Scotland)"? I remind the Committee that the Union with Scotland Act 1706 contained 25 articles committing the Scottish people to full political, economic and fiscal union for ever. The words "for ever" are important.

As recently as last month, in the White Paper "Scotland in the Union", the Government recognised and acknowledged that "for ever" commitment. A set number of Scottish Members of Parliament are sent to the House of Commons: that number is quite out of proportion to the number sent from other parts of the unitary kingdom. That is because section 22 of the 1706 Act—which later became the treaty of Union, having been accepted in its entirety by the English Parliament—clearly laid down the number of Scottish Members of Parliament. It also clearly laid down the commitment, for ever, to political, economic, monetary and fiscal union.

Let me remind you, Mr. Morris, that the Scottish Parliament was never dissolved; it was simply prorogued. I believe, along with many of the people of Scotland, that Scotland's 72 Members of Parliament are the guardians of the Scottish Parliament.

New clause 80 deals directly with the requirement to debate, and have the opportunity to vote on, the giving away of Scottish and unitary parliamentary, political, economic and fiscal power to the European Community. I believe that failure to debate the matter may have profound legal and political implications in Scotland. I remind you, Mr. Morris, that the new clause is supported by both Labour and Conservative Members of Parliament, and by the leader of the Ulster Unionists.

There are two groups of amendments under which consideration of clause 80 would have been possible. It is interesting to note that, under the groups relating to entry into force, the referendum and the commencement of—

The Chairman: Order. I think that I have the gist of what the hon. Gentleman is driving at.

Mr. Walker: May I make one final point, Mr. Morris?

The Chairman: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will make it briefly.

Mr. Walker: I am sorry, Mr. Morris; I do not want to speak at length unnecessarily.

When new clause 80 was tabled, the wording in relation to no powers being transferred was carefully chosen. You selected an amendment under the "Transferred Powers" list. You had produced a provisional list of amendments, and—as is in order, I understand—the new clause was carefully and deliberately worded in order to dovetail with the accompanying group, or rather with new clause 75, which was the only amendment selected at the time.

Following the tabling of new clause 74, we have a different grouping of amendments under a different heading. I suggest that new clause 80 could and should have been included: without it, we may face litigation in the Scottish courts that could delay any Bill passed by the House, and the implementation of the treaty.

It is no good your Clerk shaking his head, Mr. Morris. He and I know that the matter has not been properly challenged in the Scottish courts, because in the past referendums have dealt with the question of what the people think. That was true of the European Communities Act 1972. When there was any possibility of a challenge —[Interruption.] This is important, Mr. Morris.

The Chairman: The hon. Member keeps saying that he will be brief. I think that he has made his point and I recognise the strength of his feeling. I have given careful thought to the new clause, which, if I may say so, reflects a distinctive view of the effects and significance of the Bill. Despite that, and the range of support for it, I regret that I am unable to alter my original decision not to select it for consideration.

I say as an Englishman that "prorogation" is an English term. I am advised that the Parliament of Scotland was continued in 1706 and not prorogued.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. Will you confirm that, if your decision is sustained, there will be a class of amendments or new clauses that will be debated and then voted on immediately? That, but for the chance of selection, is a normal occurrence. But for the fact that amendment No. 27 had to take its turn with other amendments in the order of voting, there would have been no time for any decision to be made.

If the precedent is supported—it is an important and, in my view, a dangerous one for the functioning of the House of Commons—and amendments are not voted on immediately following debate, we shall be refused a chance to vote for or against them in any future circumstances. I find that disturbing.

If the proposition were put to the House of Commons in those terms, I think that it would be rejected by hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber, bearing in mind particularly the fact that the order of selection is in the hands of the Chairman of Ways and Means and not those of the Committee. The Chairman can select the amendments on which he wants to have second thoughts to ensure that they are voted upon at a stage subsequent to the debate. That being so, he can use the opportunity to decide that there will be no vote. That is alarming.

I hope, Mr. Morris, that even at this stage you will reconsider the matter. There certainly will be criticism that the procedure that we are discussing works in favour of the Government when your function is to act as a neutral Chairman. The fact is that your decision supports or is in favour of the Government. As amendment No. 27 was the one amendment of which the Government were fearful, that suggests to many both inside and outside the House of Commons that it is not a neutral position.

I have one further point of order, Mr. Morris.

The Chairman: No. I take one point of order at a time. I wish to make it clear to the Committee that I am, have been and will continue to be entirely neutral in the handling of the Bill. I hope that the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) will study my statement on voting. He should study it. I have created no precedents for voting on amendments.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. The right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) talked about the precedents that are created by these proceedings. You will recollect that, on Thursday, I raised with you the important interview that you gave on the BBC "Westminister Live" programme. You rebuked me for not having a transcript of your important remarks. I say immediately that I was much humiliated by your rebuke, and I apologise for not having a transcript. I have now, as you know, supplied you with a transcript of your historic interview.

It is plain that the first consideration is that the occupant of the Chair cannot give reasons to the Members of the House of Commons for his or her decisions. The transcript reveals, however, that you gave reasons to the viewers of "Westminister Live". Presumably that means that you have set a precedent by which the Chair, which I assume includes the Speaker, gives reasons to television viewers but not to the House of Commons.

That is a most interesting and modern precedent of widespread importance. I hope that you will confirm that it is to be followed by the Chair in all its manifestations. It would seem that our attendance in this place is entirely unnecessary. The main thing that we must all do is buy a television set.

The Chairman: I note once again that the hon. Member did not quote directly from the transcript. He will have to take it from me that I gave no reasons to the viewers. I merely positioned the debate.

5.15 pm

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. I have no wish to personalise the matter —I accept entirely that you have responsibilities in the Chair—but I wonder whether you will accept the point that has been made repeatedly: that we, as Members of the House of Commons, have responsibilities, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) said at the beginning of these exchanges.

You will know from your long experience of the House of Commons, Mr. Morris, that, when Members, whether in the minority or otherwise, feel that they have been cheated out of a debate or a vote that they believe should have taken place, feelings will run extremely high. I remind you that, last Thursday, you accepted—obviously, I am pleased that you did—a motion moved by my right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) to the effect that the Committee should report progress and sit again. That was all that the Committee could do to show that it wanted a vote on amendment No. 27.

Perhaps I might remind you, Mr. Morris, that, when it came to a vote, and when we were in the Division Lobby, we received the message that the Government were not appointing Tellers. We could only come to the conclusion —I accept that it is not your business to come to such a conclusion—that the Government knew that they would lose the vote. As a matter of fact, the motion was carried without a vote. That was the only way in which we could show our opposition to and criticism of your decision.

As the matter will not go away—the points of order this afternoon show that—I beg you, Mr. Morris, to bear in mind the views that have been expressed, including those from the Liberal Bench. Undoubtedly, Liberal Members are much in favour of the Bill. Indeed, they could be even more enthusiastic about it than the Government. Nevertheless, on Thursday, they expressed their point of view, which was similar to that of those of us who are critical of the Bill, on amendment No. 27. If you cannot do so now, Mr. Morris, I ask you later to reconsider the issue and to bear in mind the strength of feeling, which, I repeat, will not go away.

The Chairman: I accept that feelings run very high, and that is why I have given the matter the care and attention that I have. At the end of the day, I have a job to do, and I have done it to the best of my ability.

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. As an overwhelming majority of Members of the House of Commons are in favour of the Bill, would it not be in order to move on to a debate on principle? Those who wish to vote for the social protocol can do so when we come to new clauses 74 and 75. That reflects the overwhelming majority of those who are in favour of the Bill. As those Members would wish to express their views clearly, your position is entirely understandable, Mr. Morris, given that amendment No. 27 is entirely unclear in its application. Therefore, I believe that your decision is to be supported.

The Chairman: I note the hon. Member's view.

Mr. Stephen Byers (Wallsend): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. I take up your decision to select for debate and decision new clause 74. You will be aware that, in the context of both amendment No. 27 and new clause 75, the Government used the advice of the Law Officers to wriggle out of a debate and a vote on the issues raised by the amendment and the new clause. I have no doubt that, in the light of your decision to select for debate and Division new clause 74, some of the best legal brains will be subjecting the new clause to detailed scrutiny.

Is it your view, Mr. Morris, that new clause 74 does not mean only that the Bill, when enacted, cannot come into force until the House of Commons has had a chance to debate and vote on the inclusion of the social chapter? In this instance, the constitutional position is different from the legal position. Constitutionally, Her Majesty's Government cannot move to ratify the Maastricht treaty until such a debate and vote have taken place.

The Chairman: That is a matter for debate when we get to it.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. In your statement explaining why you would not allow the Committee a vote on amendment No. 27, you said that the Chair would not allow a separate Division on an amendment if the Chair believed that the amendment was insufficiently clear and had doubts about its effect on the Bill. In saying that, you were in effect the custodian of the Bill rather than the custodian of the rights of the Committee.

The amendment's effect was perfectly clear to the Committee: it would have involved the disbursement of public funds to pay for the implementation of the social chapter by the 11 other members of the Community. You, as Chairman of Ways and Means, have a responsibility to ensure that the Committee has a chance to vote on it. Will you duly reflect again?

The Chairman: The hon. Gentleman is beginning to move into the argument again. I ask him to study the words that I used. I said that, in arriving at such a decision on an amendment, I was giving general guidance.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. In the event of either or both new clauses 74 and 75 being withdrawn, would you need to reconsider your decision on voting on amendment No. 27?

The Chairman: That is hypothetical.

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills): I should like to associate myself with the remarks by the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) and all the others who have spoken in a similar vein, because the abandonment of so many amendments and our right to vote on them has enormous constitutional consequences for the running of the Chamber. I remind you, Mr. Morris, of what you reminded us of last Thursday, to which the right hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) also referred. You said:

"We are some way off a vote on amendment No. 27, and other developments may occur at any time, but at this juncture I am minded to take seriously the need for a further debate before the Committee votes on that amendment".—[Official Report, 22 February 1993; Vol. 219, c. 685.]

All the subsequent arguments of which you advised us were about whether there would be a debate before we voted on amendment No. 27. If your ruling stands, you will be setting a precedent whereby the Committee will not be sure whether we can move and vote on amendments, because you are setting aside all votes on virtually all amendments tabled by Members of good standing. How do we express our view? That is why I wish to associate myself with the burden of the argument made by the right hon. Member for Chesterfield.

The Chairman: It is the hon. Gentleman's right to interpret as he wishes, but his interpretation is not necessarily shared by the Chair or anyone else. My words to the Committee were very clear right from the start: I am totally impartial in this matter. Hon. Members will have to accept that, whether they like it or not. They can put whatever interpretation they like on that, and everyone —not least the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd)—should recognise that statement from me.

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): Will you please advise us, Mr. Morris, how the Committee is to express its wish to vote on amendment No. 27? What means and procedures are available to the Committee to do so?

The Chairman: Hon. Members can make representations but, at the end of the day, the power rests with the Chair, and the Chair has ruled.

Mr. Roger Knapman (Stroud): We know that you have given very careful thought to the selection of amendments, Mr. Morris, because you tell us so. You have told us that selection depends on the clarity and effect of an amendment. In that case, under amendment No. 27, my constituents in Stroud are being asked to pay through their VAT towards implementation of the social chapter in other countries. Shall I have an opportunity to vote on that issue? If clarity is so important, why has new clause 74 appeared, as it refers to a motion yet to be tabled by a Minister of the Crown? How can there be clarity when the motion has yet to be worded?

The Chairman: The hon. Gentleman must make his own interpretation of new clause 74. It seemed an appropriate new clause for consideration as far as I was concerned.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Will you tell the people—not principally hon. Members but those who watch our proceedings and read Hansard—why such a decision has been taken by the Chair when a majority of hon. Members want a vote? How is it the Chair can say, "Sorry, we are not having a vote," even though, on 22 February, the same Chair said that we could have a debate and a vote?

People outside, who believe that the Chair is supposed to be impartial, will think that we should have a vote, because a majority—or so it seems—of members of the Opposition want to vote. People will not understand why the majority have no recourse to further action to get a vote, or even an explanation.

I know of no organisation or society to which I belong in which the Chair is not called on to explain its conduct; in the Labour party, in a trade union and, I suppose, in big business—although I do not know—it is likely to be called on to do so. The Chair is under so much pressure and, having had a week to think about it, is not prepared to explain how it reached a decision in line with the Government's views——

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Skinner: I have not finished yet.

The Chairman: All right, I shall come back to the hon. Gentleman in a minute.

Mr. Skinner: I want to know why you are leaning toward the Government. Why?

The Chairman: Order. I am trying to answer the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Skinner: You have had three days to think about it, and you are still on the Government's side. There is something bent about it. I am not prepared to accept this mumbo-jumbo. You are acting like a Tory Member on behalf of the Government. You cannot convince me otherwise. You have made it clear again and again that you back the Government.

The Chairman: Order. I repeat to the hon. Gentleman in particular, and to other hon. Members who have referred to it, that I am wholly impartial about the Bill. I do not care what manifestations or attitudes any hon. Member takes; I am wholly impartial. I make that clear to every hon. and right hon. Member in the Chamber now, and to every hon. and right hon. Member who is no longer in the Chamber.

[The Chairman]

The hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) would be the first to acknowledge that it is not the number of hon. Members which decides whether a vote takes place. He will recall many occasions when he has caused a vote backed by very few hon. Members present, and the Chair has accepted it.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. On BBC2 on 13 April, you said that there had been "a significant Second Reading" of the Bill and that you "cannot wreck the Bill". In saying that, did you not, in effect, explain your decision not to allow a vote on amendment No. 27?

The Chairman: I was merely reflecting the rules of the House in making that statement.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. It is common ground that amendment No. 27 is quite different in detail and effect from new clauses 74 and 75. It is common ground that amendment No. 27 has been well debated and deals with a distinct and important constitutional issue. It is also common ground that a majority of hon. Members want a vote on amendment No. 27. I know what the Standing Orders say, and I know what "Erskine May" says, but nothing prevents you from telling the Committee why, in these circumstances, we cannot vote on amendment No. 27. My constituents want to know.

The Chairman: I have never noticed the hon. Gentleman having any problem communicating with his constituents, who are right next door to mine. I am not commenting on the hon. Gentleman's alleged common ground.

5.30 pm

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. I truly need your help, as a recent recruit to the Chairman's Panel. The procedural aspects of the present dilemma not only fascinate but dismay me—because, if I maintain my position on the Chairmen's Panel, I may find myself in a similar situation in future.

You said, Mr. Morris, that the Chairman has the right to allow or deny a vote. Does that mean that, if members of the Committee, regardless of whether or not they are in favour of amendment No. 27, were interested in arriving at some kind of democratic determination and tabled a motion this evening saying, "We seek a Division on amendment No. 27", and more than 326 right hon. and hon. Members voted in favour of it, that would be disregarded by the Chair?

The Chairman: The hon. Gentleman knows that is not the way that the Committee works, and that such decisions are left to the Chair.

Dr. John Cunningham: I noted your earlier advice, Mr. Morris, to read carefully in Hansard the wording of your statement. That implies that we shall have to study the exact nature of your statement tomorrow. In so far as you spelled out factors as to whether or not amendments should be voted upon, I cannot myself accept that it is the responsibility of the Chair to take account of political judgments about the effect of amendments on legislation. Surely it is for the Chair to rule whether or not an amendment is procedurally in order, not to make political judgments.

In view of your remarks, I hope that the Committee will again pause and carefully study your observations—not least because, to coin a phrase, I do not want to throw out the opportunity to vote on amendment No. 27 on Report as the Committee tries to throw out the occupant of the Chair in any motion at this stage.

I hope that members of the Committee will pause and reflect, and will read carefully tomorrow in Hansard your statement, Mr. Morris, and not rush into taking ill-judged decisions that may prevent the House once and for all having an opportunity to vote on amendment No. 27.

As I said before, I believe that there is an unanswerable case for tabling and debating that amendment on Report, when any decision will be taken not by you, Mr. Morris, but by Madam Speaker.

The Chairman: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman.

Several hon. Members rose——

The Chairman: Order. I have called every right hon. and hon. Gentleman who wanted to raise a point of order. We will now move on to amendment No. 57.

Mr. Spearing: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. It is a different point of order.

The Chairman: I make it clear that it must be a new point of order. I note the four hon. Members who sought to catch my eye, and I will accept new points of order from them.

Mr. Spearing: My point of order relates to amendment No. 426, which, if it is pressed, could be voted on four hours or less from now. Whereas amendment No. 27 received enormous publicity and has been considered by you, Mr. Morris, and by the Committee for a long time, amendment No. 426 will not have the same advantage. That amendment, which relates to the proceedings for direct elections to the European Parliament under article 138(3) of the treaty of Rome, calls for those procedures to be fully implemented in the United Kingdom.

Article 138(3) states that the European Parliament

"shall draw up proposals for elections by direct universal suffrage in accordance with a uniform procedure in all Member States."

There are at least three interpretations of the amendment's implications, coupled with the article of the treaty of Rome to which it refers. One is that the procedure will apply in every member state of the European Community.

Another is that the procedure will be uniform within each member state. If the latter, and that is applied to the United Kingdom, it must be noted that the United Kingdom has no uniform procedure. The procedure in Northern Ireland differs from that in the rest of the United Kingdom.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman does not need to remind the Committee of the debate that we had some days ago. In all honesty, it seems that I cannot win. When I select an amendment on which some right hon. and hon. Members want a vote, I receive a complaint on a point of order from an hon. Member who does not want a vote on it.

Mr. Spearing: No, Mr. Morris.

The Chairman: That is my interpretation of the hon. Gentleman's point of order.

Mr. Spearing: I am asking whether it is in the remit of the Chair to explain the effects on this country's constitution of amendment No. 426. It will mean either that Northern Ireland has to adopt our procedures, or that we will have to adopt those of Northern Ireland.

The Chairman: The answer is no, that is not in the remit of the Chair.

Several hon. Members rose——

The Chairman: Order. I said that I would call four hon. Members who had stood in their places, and the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) was one of them.

Mr. Cash: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. Is it a Standing Order or a matter of practice as to whether or not reasons are given for selecting amendments and apparently for allowing Divisions? If the latter, by what practice, because page 405 of "Erskine May"——

The Chairman: Order. It is a matter of practice. Mr. Cryer.

Mr. Cash rose——

The Chairman: Order. I have called Mr. Cryer.

Mr. Cryer: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. As the Committee will debate the Bill again on Wednesday, can you say whether a motion of no confidence would take precedence over further debate in Committee? It seems to me highly desirable—arising out of your refusal to allow a Division on amendment No. 27—to allow a debate on that issue and to vote on it. Also, would such a debate be limited to three hours, or would it occupy the whole of Wednesday?

The Chairman: Those matters are not for me.

Mr. Knapman: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. You will acknowledge that right hon. and hon. Members in all parts of the Committee have voiced over the past half an hour deep-seated concern about certain aspects of Committee procedures. You seemed to suggest that right hon. and hon. Members would be restricted to raising one point of order. Is that the case?

The Chairman: I find it rather easier to deal with one point of order at a time. Mr. Walker—this is the last point of order.

Mr. Bill Walker: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. Will you confirm that your advice is that the Scottish Parliament has been dissolved? If it has not, why can it not be recalled? The advice given by legal brains in Scotland may run contrary to your advice—in which case your decisions as to what is relevant and should be debated may be subject to revision. The Maastricht treaty goes right to the heart of the treaty of Union between Scotland and England. I speak as a unionist and as a supporter of this unitary Parliament. Because I care so deeply, I believe that we will be in danger of entering into the worst possible political, economic and legal minefield if we get it wrong.

The Chairman: I receive very good advice, especially on Scottish matters.

I may comment finally, especially to the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash), that of course "Erskine May" is all about procedure.

Treaty on European Union

Sir Teddy Taylor: I beg to move amendment No. 57, in page 1, line 10, after '1992', insert
'but not Article 201 in Title II thereof'.
I have been waiting since four o'clock last Thursday to introduce this important amendment, which is the only one in my name to be selected for separate debate. Unfortunately, I have contracted a cold, but I hope that I shall still be able to make an extensive speech.

It is a great help to have my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General in his place on the Treasury Bench. We regard him as one of the more constructive members of the Government. While we know that they all have their assets, my right hon. Friend is someone who is constructive, looks forward and tries to solve problems.

The amendment is designed to suggest to the Committee how we might solve some of the appalling problems that face the European Community, of which both its supporters and opponents are well aware. We are well aware, from the small number of hon. Members who attend these debates, that hon. Members do not want to listen to the arguments. Nevertheless, there is a deep-down feeling throughout the House of Commons that things are going terribly wrong with the European Community: that the EC's share of world trade is going down and down, that unemployment in the EC is soaring and that expenditure by the EC is riddled with graft and corruption. The tragedy is that no one has the slightest idea what to do about it.

My impression is that most members of the Government party, who are now sickened with the whole EC business, are genuinely not sure what on earth they should do. They are worried about the EC, but they say, "We've got to support the Prime Minister. The negotiations are too far advanced. We don't know which way to turn, so what on earth else should we do?"

The impression that I have gained throughout the whole debate on the treaty is that hon. Members feel that we are stuck on a tightrope, that we are heading towards a cliff and that we cannot turn either to the right or to the left, or even back. No one, apart from the Liberal Democrats—who, I accept, are sincere people, as we have seen in all our debates on the treaty—seems to be genuinely supportive of Maastricht. No one seems to think that Maastricht will be a good deal. The Government talk about Maastricht, warts and all. They say that they do not want to improve Maastricht, despite warts and all. Some of my hon. Friends say, "Don't worry about the Maastricht treaty; the exchange rate mechanism won't come back", even though the treaty makes it clear that we must try to get back into the ERM from 1 January next.

In this amendment I am suggesting an answer that might bring all hon. Members, both supporters and opponents of Maastricht, together and solve some of the problems that worry them. The amendment suggests that we should delete article 201 on page 56 of the treaty.

Mr. Marlow: I have read my hon. Friend's amendment. It is a good one. I am looking forward to the rest of his speech. My hon. Friend suggests, in effect, that we should take the Community's budget away. That is a very good idea. However, would not a better way of approaching it be to adopt another suggestion? My hon. Friend is well aware of the fact that about a fortnight ago some Italian either jumped or was pushed from a 16th floor window in Brussels. There are allegations that he was tied up with the Mafia. There are also allegations that £1,000 million of our money has been misapplied through some fraud related to tobacco. Should there not be a total review of the Commission and of all who work in it, in terms of where there is fraud, where there is not fraud, whether money has been properly applied and the involvement of the Mafia in the Commission? Should not that be a matter of great urgency and should not that inquiry take place before there is any further debate on this wretched piece of paper that we are concerned with?

Sir Teddy Taylor: I appeal to hon. Members not to pay attention to that. It has been tried time and time again. The trouble with people who are positive about the EC is that we have tried all this before. For example, an organisation looked into all the fraud and all the rubbish. It said that it would do the job for us. Then we had Maastricht. A fraud department was to be set up. According to the Maastricht treaty, the idea is that, somehow, the European Parliament will look into all this. I appeal to my hon. Friends not to be misled by that suggestion. It will not work. We have heard talk of the common agricultural policy being reformed. It cannot be reformed. I appeal to the Committee, and in particular to the Paymaster General, to give a message to the European Community about where Britain wants it to go and how we can make the EC work more effectively.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): Can the hon. Gentleman emphasise one simple fact: that the powers to audit and change the rules relating to fraud and to take action against those found guilty of defrauding the EC have existed since the earliest treaties and that the European Parliament has never chosen to use those powers properly, nor has any subsequent Commission?

5.45 pm

Sir Teddy Taylor: The hon. Lady is so right. I heard her in European Standing Committee A, before I was chucked off it for asking too many questions, rightly saying over and over again that fraud had been proved and that lots of money, which could be spent on helping the poor and pensioners, is being thrown away. The hon. Lady pointed out that the European Parliament has the powers but that they are not being used and that they cannot be used. That is the great tragedy. Instead of laughing at this, I appeal to the House of Commons to say, "Where the blazes are we going?" We all know that the European Community is in a terrible mess, that democracy is being destroyed, that unemployment is soaring and that Europe's share of world trade is going down, so what on earth, I ask the Government, do they think we should do about it?

Mr. Marlow: If, as may well be the case, the Commission is as rotten with the Mafia as gorgonzola cheese is with maggots, who is it that can sort it out? Is it only the Commission, or can Her Majesty's Government do something about it? Unless somebody does something about it soon, there is not a lot of point in proceeding with this treaty, or any other European legislation.

Sir Teddy Taylor: My hon. Friend is one of the most conscientious people attending these debates. I know that his heart is in the right place, but I appeal to him not to look for an answer in the Commission. It cannot be found there. I appeal to him not to look for an answer in setting up new Committees or new organisations. We have been through all that. I appeal to him, as someone who represents very fairly and adequately the interests of farmers in this country, to ask what on earth can be done about the common agricultural policy. The answer is, nothing. The CAP is getting worse and worse. The tragedy is that nowadays nobody talks about the fact that the food mountains are breaking all records, because they know that there is nothing that we can do about the CAP. We all know that the CAP is in worse trouble than ever before, so nobody wants to talk about it.

Mr. Walter Sweeney (Vale of Glamorgan): My hon. Friend drew the analogy of a car going towards a cliff, unable to turn left or right, or to turn round and go back. Would not it be fair to describe this vehicle as one in which the accelerator is stuck down and that we in this country are required to chip in and load that vehicle, which has enormous petrol tanks, with a very expensive load of fuel in order to enable that vehicle to pursue its headlong pace towards the precipice?

Sir Teddy Taylor: How right my hon. Friend is. That is the key fact that we should think about. We are putting in more and more money and, as a result of Maastricht, there will be a lot more money going into the European Community. This year it amounts to £2·6 billion. I just ask those who sit on the Treasury Bench to think about what we could do with that money, if we had it. Let us take, for example, VAT on electricity and gas. It is terribly unpopular. Old people think that it is dreadful. We, sadly, on these Benches voted for it because the Government appeared to be going bust and we had to get some money from somewhere. If we did not have to make that contribution to the European Community, this VAT levy on electricity and gas would not be needed. We should have a lot of money to spare. That is what we must think about.

What would be the effect of having the European Community without any funding at all? Some of my hon. Friends are absolutely right when they say that we are being asked to put more and more money into it. My first question to the Paymaster General, because I know that he is one of the Ministers who will tell us the truth, relates to the fact that as a result of article 201 it was decided at Edinburgh, on top of all the resources going to the European Community, that there would have to be a new one—a fifth resource.

The Commission was asked to give its view of what this should be. This morning's papers tell us that a new EC tax on energy is being discussed which will result in electricity bills being put up by a further 20 per cent. Apparently, that is to be the first of the European Community's own resources, the one which will be a European tax. The papers say that the British Government are not very happy about it. If we go ahead with it and say to people that, on top of VAT on their electricity bills, there will be a new, extra Common Market tax of 20 per cent., they will be very angry and will probably lose even more faith in democracy.

The purpose of the amendment is not just to raise a marginal argument about the proposed changes and the extension of EC spending, but to try to find an answer to the problems of the EC. My hope is that the Government will approve the amendment. I hope that they will, because they have been flexible in their attitude and have now agreed to back new clause 75, which was originally said to be a time bomb. They have now thought again about that. I am seeking to remove every single word in the treaty about European Community resources. That might persuade other member states in the European Community to ask themselves whether the EC would be better off or worse off if it did not have a single pound or ecu to spend and if it returned to its original concept, approved by the people of Britain in a referendum, of establishing a body of nations to co-operate on trade, friendship and related matters.

I do not seek to hide the fact that I was one of the "no" campaigners in that referendum and I have never had cause to regret my decision. In the horrendous mess we now face in Europe, with mass unemployment, with horrendous graft and corruption, with the ever-declining share of world trade and with unworkable and uncontrollable policies, there can be little doubt that everyone, with the possible exception of the Mafia, would be better off if the Brussels bureaucracy was deprived of all its resources. How is the money collected under article——

Mr. Marlow: I am listening to my hon. Friend with interest and I am very keen to know what the effects of the amendment would be. My hon. Friend is aware that the treaty establishes something called the cohesion fund, which is a means whereby the Commission gives favours to people in return for support. My understanding is that the cohesion fund should not come into effect until ratification, yet I read last week that the cohesion fund is beginning to take effect already and that money is already being provided through it. Would the amendment stop that abuse? As we have not ratified the treaty and as Parliament has not agreed to the treaty yet, it must be an abuse that money is being spent on something coming out of the Maastricht treaty.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Oh yes. My hon. Friend is so right. If he votes for the amendment, that abuse will be stopped. The cash should be cut off. What the Government could then do to save Europe would be—this is our answer—to have a Europe without any cash at all.

Mr. Cash: I am sure that my hon. Friend was not referring to me when he made that remark.

I refer to article F.3 of the treaty and I am sure that my hon. Friend will not mind my reading it out. The article says:

"The Union shall provide itself with the means necessary to attain its objectives and to carry through its policies."

I hope that I am not pre-empting a point that my hon. Friend is likely to make shortly. That article comes under title I, "Common Provisions", which is being shoved through disgracefully by prerogative and which is not part of the Bill. It provides for the union to have the means necessary to attain its objectives. That is critical to the question of own resources. How on earth can anyone justify, against the background of the requirements of this place—this point is tied up with the social chapter and with all the other matters that we have discussed, such as raising taxation—the provision going through by prerogative? It will be the basis for all the corruption and fraud that we see in prospect.

Sir Teddy Taylor: My hon. Friend is putting a genuine point and is saying that there is something else in the treaty, as hon. Members may know. There is probably no one among the newer, younger and more active hon. Members who has played a greater part than my hon. Friend in drawing people's attention to the dangers of all the spending, fraud and corruption. I appeal to my hon. Friend not to ask how we can debate article F.3. We shall not be allowed to debate article F.3. How can we control the spending, fraud and corruption? I believe that we need the support of the Government and that we need a vote by Parliament to say that the British point of view is that we should have a Europe without any resources.

Rev. Ian Paisley (Antrim, North): The hon. Gentleman referred to the report from Brussels of a 20 per cent. rise in electricity charges. Is he aware that that will be used as a sop in the Denmark referendum? Because the politicians in Denmark feel that they may lose the referendum, they believe that, to get the green lobby, they must have a rise in the price of electricity.

Sir Teddy Taylor: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Terrible things are happening in the attempt to get votes and support. We know what happened with the Republic of Ireland, for example. I feel sorry for some of the ports of Northern Ireland which now find themselves facing wholly unfair competition because of what Maastricht will do, through the cohesion fund, to ports just south of the border. Many of these things are done for votes. I appeal again to the Committee: although there are terrible things and although they are getting worse, let us try to find some answer to the problem.

My answer is that the British Government should say, "We want the future to be a Europe without funds. We think that the problems would be solved if funds were removed. If we do not do that, things will simply get worse." Where does the money come from? At present there are four components.

Mr. Stephen Day (Cheadle): Is not my hon. Friend saying in reality that a Europe without funds is no Europe at all? Is not he really telling the House that that is what he desires? Is not that the nub of the issue? My hon. Friend undoubtedly speaks eloquently about protecting the sovereignty of this place. He also mentioned the Irish Republic. Is not he really saying that he believes that Britain's position in the new Europe that he envisages—that is, no Europe at all—relative to Brussels, if it carries on without us, will be the same as Dublin's position relative to London before the Irish Republic gained some sovereignty by joining the EC?

Sir Teddy Taylor: Goodness gracious, I am saying exactly the opposite. If we have an EC without funding, of course there can still be free trade, co-operation and friendship. How can my hon. Friend say to his constituents—I am sure that he has many poor constituents who face hardship, whom he looks after very well—"I am terribly sorry. We are spending a fortune on fraud, on tobacco and on agriculture. We have a bank that is wasting money like water and there is nothing that I can do about it." My hon. Friend may believe in a good future for the EC. I believe that it will end up in tears the way it is going. It will end up with people marching in the streets. It will end up with mass unemployment. If there was no funding, the EC could carry on doing all the positive things that some people think it can do, such as promoting free trade and friendship, but it would not waste money with policies that inevitably lead to graft and corruption, as we well see.

I see that the conscientious hon. Member for Harlow (Mr. Hayes) has just walked into the Chamber. I am sure that he must be aware of many poor constituents who face hardship. He must be very angry when he hears about the money being wasted in fraud and corruption in the EC. His people want to know what he intends to do about it. The answer is that there is nothing that we can do about it because of the EC's crazy policies. The only thing to do is to take away the money and put it under the democratic control of member states.

Mr. Jerry Hayes (Harlow): What I shall do about it is to vote for the Maastricht treaty so that the courts can intervene to stop these things happening, which they cannot do under the treaty of Rome.

Sir Teddy Taylor: My hon. Friend is one of the younger and more enthusiastic hon. Members. I appeal to him to look back at the assurances given in the past. Baroness Thatcher, who used to be the Conservative Prime Minister —a splendid lady—also thought that she had the answer. She said, "Vote for the Single European Act. It is great. We shall get legally binding controls on spending. We shall not be able to spend a penny more on the agriculture policy. Things will automatically happen." She found out what happened. I am afraid that she was misled in the same way as my hon. Friend the Member for Harlow has been. What happened was that, whenever the controls were breached, the EC Commission, followed by the Council of Finance Ministers, simply said that it would have a metric year of 10 months, with 12 months' income and 10 months' spending. That is how it kept within the legally binding restrictions.

I point out to my hon. Friend the Member for Harlow that we have been told this time and time again. Decent, honourable, sincere Members like himself have been misled. If we carry on his way with Maastricht, we shall end up in a horrible mess of even more overspending, more fraud and more corruption. His constituents, for whom he works so hard, will suffer just as much as anyone else.

Mr. Barry Porter (Wirral, South): I am following the hon. Gentleman's argument with some care. There is a point that I do not understand. There appear to be rules and regulations through the Single European Act and so on about fraud and corruption. Nobody takes any notice of them and nothing happens. Why should whatever is contained in the Maastricht treaty be treated in any other way? If things are not in the national interest of Germany, Greece, and Italy—whether we are talking about olive oil, tobacco or a central bank—why should they take any notice of this treaty any more than they take any notice of the Single European Act?

Sir Teddy Taylor: Those countries will notice if we take the money away because the practices will stop. One of the interesting points of this debate—I hope that my hon. Friend has noticed—is that the newspapers that used to be terribly supportive of the EC have now become doubtful. Instead of my hon. Friend listening to me, which might involve some heartache for him, he should go to the Library and read, of all papers, today's Daily Mail. It used to be one of the most terrible papers which always presented one side of the Euro debate. It has a wonderful article today in which it gives a detailed explanation of how the most appalling frauds are going on in Greece. It points out how fraud is basically uncontrollable in Greece.

How do the frauds work? In the case of olive oil, the Daily Mail states:

> "In order to show that non-existent olive crops are real, businessmen have set up an ingenious network of fake companies that supposedly buy the produce. Of 152 companies registered as producing olive oil, only 44 actually do so. The EC pays 160 drachmas, about 50p—for every kilo of olives which ends up as bottled or canned oil. Of the 300,000 tons of olives produced annually, only about 50,000 tons go into the country's shops as oil. But subsidies were claimed last year on about 140,000 tons—amounting to £46 million in illegal handouts."

If the Daily Mail, as a great supporter of the EC, is getting worried, I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Porter) must be worried, because nothing is being done about it. It is terrible that open, basic, criminal fraud should be occurring in Greece. Money is pouring in and it is appalling that great damage and distress have been caused. My hon. Friend, who I know has taken a great interest in Euro matters, should ask what he can do about that dreadful problem. The answer is nothing at all unless he agrees that we should take away the money and let every member state look after its own resources under democratic control.

My hope is that the Committee will approve the amendment.

Mr. Barry Porter: I have taken little part in the debate over the past however many days, but I think that the Committee is in danger of reaching its boredom threshold, as has happened in the rest of the country.

Does not my hon. Friend make my point for me? Regardless of what is contained in the treaty of Rome and the Single European Act, countries behave in their own national interests and nobody does anything about it. What is so different about Maastricht? We will carry on acting in our national interest, not in connection with olive oil or tobacco, but perhaps in connection with a central bank or a common currency. None of this will happen and it is not worth all the excitement or the time spent debating it.

Sir Teddy Taylor: But the frauds are happening today. They are known as monkey crops. Of course, if there were no EC funds the Greek Government could, if they wanted to, pay for a lot of fraudulent activities for the payment of the production of goods that do not exist. If there were not EC funding, that kind of crazy activity could not take place unless the Government of Greece paid for it.

Mr. Michael Spicer: My hon. Friend the Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Porter) appears to be arguing, "Such corruptions go on in other countries. So what? The Maastricht treaty will not make any difference". Is not the whole point about the own resources issue—the one directly addressed by my hon. Friend in his amendment —that we are talking not about those countries' own resources, but about our resources? That is what is at stake and what my hon. Friend has drawn to the attention of the House. If it were just the Greeks being corrupt in Greece with their own money, it would not matter. Should not the fund be called the "other people's resources" fund rather than the "own resources" fund?

Sir Teddy Taylor: How right my hon. Friend is. Although I am sure that we will always have some graft and corruption, we want to stop such corruption being done with Euro funds. The existence of own resources means that, even though we have splendid Agriculture Ministers who work hard and try to do their best for the Community, there is nothing that they can do. I believe that the only way in which we can move forward is to take away those funds.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, unfortunately, such things are happening even though the Government, and successive Governments, have done their best to police all those arrangements? While we keep to the letter of the EC law, other Governments do not. Therefore, our country has to bow down and take all the stick.

Sir Teddy Taylor: I appreciate how my hon. Friend must feel, because Britain is a law-abiding country, whereas the other countries are basically ignoring the law and grabbing money through fraudulent, filthy graft, greed and corruption. What are we going to do about it? I appeal to the Committee not merely to acknowledge that the problems exist but to consider what we can do about them.

Mr. Day: In dealing with that point, my hon. Friend should recognise that the Maastricht treaty essentially increases the powers of the European Court to deal with such problems as non-compliance to which some of my hon. Friends seem to object so strongly. The mechanism for dealing with the corruption is in the treaty. We should support the treaty and get rid of the abuse.

Sir Teddy Taylor: If my hon. Friend believes that—and I am sure that he will reflect on his view—he should look back at our previous debates. We have repeatedly been told, "New measures are being taken, new bodies set up, new fraud commissions created." We have been told that all kinds of things are happening, but such measures have never worked and can never work. Perhaps my hon. Friend is contemplating voting for the proposals and has been misled into thinking that giving a new power to the European Parliament—or saying that we are giving an institution such as the Court of Auditors new significance and increased importance—will help. If so, he should bear in mind the fact that, for years, the Court of Auditors has been publishing information on the basis of regular research which shows how money is pouring down a big drain, but that, sadly, nothing happens; things simply get worse and worse.

With the Maastricht treaty, we are simply obtaining yet more assurances that something will be done while at the same time giving out more money—more own resources. The problem will get worse. If my hon. Friend has been misled, as we have been misled in the past, he should say, "Let us look at the crazy policies that create all the spending and do something about them."

What started as a moderate and limited amount of spending by Brussels has increased and is now set to increase further. One or two hon. Members see some hope in Maastricht. To my mind, cause for optimism is to be found only in future estimates of total EC spending and of our own contribution. The trouble is that they are invariably wrong. I suppose that they help to restore fading morale, at least.

The Foreign Office is particularly helpful in this regard. On 11 June, at column 438 of Hansard, the Chancellor of the Exchequer explained that our net contribution for 1992 was forecast to be £2·6 billion, which is about £4 per week per British family. However, in its colourful and wildly misleading pamphlet, produced at great expense and entitled "Britain in Europe", the Foreign Office explained that the figure was actually £1·7 billion. When I asked about the difference, I was told that different ways of doing sums had been used in each case, which is true. Similarly, in Edinburgh, where the new own resources regime was discussed, we were assured that there were firm controls on spending. Hon. Members will see that commitments agreed at Edinburgh were greatly in excess of the agreed own resources ceiling.

The question that I put to the House is simply whether it makes sense to have any own resources at all. Does it make Europe any stronger, any bigger, any fitter or any more just? Does it help jobs or prosperity? Frankly, I think that it would be infinitely better for those who believe in Europe if we scrapped own resources altogether.

The first problem that inevitably emerges when substantial own resources are made available to a non-democratic structure based on nonsensical policies is that a great deal of cash goes in waste, extravagance and fraud. I could provide many examples, but I shall restrict myself to three.

Mr. Sweeney: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way in mid-flow. Is he arguing—in a nutshell—that, if we prevent money from being dished out throughout the Community, we automatically prevent graft and corruption by drying off the font from which the funds that finance that corruption emanate? Playing devil's advocate, let me ask my hon. Friend this. One of the arguments advanced in favour of this treaty of European union is that the European Court will henceforth have power to impose sanctions in the form of substantial—indeed, unlimited —fines on member states that transgress the provisions of European law. What would my hon. Friend say to those who might argue that opportunities for graft and corruption will effectively be eliminated, or at least dramatically reduced, if the treaty is ratified?

Sir Teddy Taylor: Why should we bother even investigating the possibility of whether the Maastricht treaty will make it more effective to control those policies? If we scrap the policies, we will guarantee success. For example, if we did not have the common agricultural policy, which is based on opportunities for fraud and corruption, the problems would not exist.

Obviously, there may be graft and corruption in every member state. However, if there are democratic controls and if people know that it is their money that is being spent, there will be some kind of control. If we do away with the policies which are not subject to democratic control and which countries regard as a means of pinching from other countries, we will do away with a great deal of the graft and corruption.

We know that there is an enormous amount of graft and corruption in Greece. Why should the Greek Government bother much about what is happening unless they have a special wish to pursue sensible policies based on objectivity? Why should the Greek Government bother as they are basically pinching money from other member states? That is quite a nice position.

We know that some dreadful things are happening in the Republic of Ireland. If money is pouring into the Republic of Ireland for graft and corruption, why should the Government there be bothered? What about the terrible amounts of money paid to the Mafia in Italy for delivering non-existent fruit juice to a firm in Palermo? Why should the Italians bother about that when the money is simply being taken from Brussels? If there were democratic controls and the money involved belonged to the country concerned, the problems would fade away.

I want to consider three specific examples of how waste and corruption arise inevitably from the existence of own resources. First, there were the astonishing revelations which originally appeared in that splendid paper the Financial Times about the wild and extravagant spending of the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development, which is headed by a rather unusual Frenchman who has no banking experience and whose sole claim to fame is that he impressed President Mitterrand when they met in a nightclub.

We have all read about the monstrous expenditure of the bank on its temporary accommodation, on its replacement marble, on its very extravagant parties and on those ridiculous private jets which were three times as dear as the British private jets that could have been borrowed. No tax was paid on all that. We should not ask ourselves why the issue has, according to the press, apparently infuriated MEPs. Instead, we should ask ourselves how all that could happen when the bank was operating under the control of a Euro-board that includes our own excellent Chancellor of the Exchequer.

We know that our Chancellor of the Exchequer is a tough man who watches spending very carefully indeed. We know that he is worried about every penny of expenditure in this country. However, that Frenchman is operating on the board on which sits not only our Chancellor of the Exchequer, but Finance Ministers from other countries and yet it goes on and nothing is done about it.

The plain fact is not that our Chancellor of the Exchequer is at fault, but that such wild spending is uncontrollable under the EC system. Instead of trying to say who is to blame or that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has made an appalling mess of the issue, it would be better if we recognised that the system was wrong and that something should be done about it.

My second example relates to the astonishing and worrying tale of that pathetic EC official who fell to his death from a window in the Commission's office.

Mr. Spearing: Before the hon. Gentleman leaves the EBRD, surely the Committee cannot leave the issue of the governorship and the responsibilities of the Chancellor of the Exchequer just like that. The Paymaster General is in the Committee this afternoon. Should not we have some explanation from him about the conduct of the governor, who is acting on our behalf and who presumably guarantees the bank with taxpayers' money?

Sir Teddy Taylor: I believe that that would be unfair. As we know, the Paymaster General is one of the most decent and, in my view—I mean this sincerely—honourable members of the Government. I suggest that we should not say who is to blame. There is nothing that we can do about it.

The Paymaster General (Sir John Cope): I apologise for interrupting my hon. Friend, particularly as he was being polite to me. My interruption has nothing to do with whether I think that he might damage my career if he continues in that fashion. I simply want to draw the attention of the Committee to the fact that the EBRD is not a European Community institution. Although there are questions that hon. Members and Ministers may properly ask, and have properly asked, about the conduct of that institution, it is not an EC institution and it would be wrong to discuss it under this Bill, let alone under this amendment.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Of course, I accept that it is not an EC institution. However, the Minister is aware that it stems from Euro discussions on how to help Russia. I understand that membership of the governing body comprises EC members.

Let us forget all about the bank. Let us pretend that it does not exist and talk simply about the Commission official who jumped from a window in Brussels. As he jumped from Jacques Delors' office window, I think that he must have had something to do with the EC. He was the chap who had been masterminding what The Observer called an astonishing tobacco swindle which filched the equivalent of £1 for every one of the EC's 320 million inhabitants.

The Observer further alleged that the sad Mr. Antonio Quatraro was believed to be working for the Mafia. Although he was basically suspended from work for over a year, he still enjoyed a tax-free salary of about £100,000 a year. Despite all the alleged reforms in the tobacco regime, the fact is that the monstrous business of growing high-tar tobacco in Europe and then dumping it in the third world and eastern Europe is costing the EC more than £1,000 million a year—about £3 a head per Euro citizen.

That is being done under own resources. This Government and other Governments have been trying to do something about the tobacco regime year after year, but the situation is getting much worse. The only way to improve matters would be to scrap own resources altogether. The EC must operate without any funding. Clearly, nothing can be done about that continuing and growing scandal. I am obviously sorry for a man who jumps from a window and kills himself on a salary of £100,000 a year. I am sorry for his wife and children. There are all kinds of personal tragedies that might stem from that. However, we must consider the most grotesque tragedy of that money being spent on crime and fraud when there are so many other better ways in which we could spend it.

Mr. Sweeney: Does my hon. Friend accept that it is not simply a matter of corruption and fraud? The very fact that the EC in effect subsidises and encourages the production of tobacco is widely deplored by members of the public, Governments and Health Ministers probably in all member states of the Community. However, year after year, public money—money belonging to the British public and the public in every member state—is spent on the artificial encouragement of the tobacco industry.

Sir Teddy Taylor: My hon. Friend is absolutely right, but what can we do about it? Ministers would also agree with my hon. Friend. It is shocking and scandalous, but there is nothing that we can do about it. Our Ministers have tried hard to do something, but if other Ministers had tried, too, something would have happened. However, expenditure simply increases, as does the amount of fraud and corruption in places like Greece. More and more money is being spent.

In fact, the EC has decided to set up an anti-smoking campaign to try to counteract what is happening. That is the kind of nonsensical answer that we get from the EC. It does not try to solve the problem, it simply tries to find a way to spend more money. If my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Sweeney) wants to stop the scandals of the tobacco expenditure, he will succeed only by scrapping own resources. There is no other way to solve the problem.

My third example relates to the disgraceful scandal of the CAP. Nothing sickens me more than to hear Ministers announcing the almost quarterly event of new reform plans. We all know that the policy is in a greater mess than ever before. EC expenditure has broken all previous records, even though Ministers continue to say that the expenditure will come down. The mountains of cereals have also broken all previous records.

Fraud and corruption are endemic in the EC's agriculture policy. It was typical to read of the £70 million subsidy under the dairy regime paid for sending two lots of milk powder to the Soviet Union and then to buy back the same milk powder as animal feed. The first shipment was dispatched from Italy to Austria and the exporters received the first subsidy to compensate for the difference between the high price in the EC and the low price in Austria.

The milk was then sold to the Soviet Union, with another subsidy, to help the Soviet Union in its new commitment to democracy. It was then returned immediately to Europe, with the usual fraudulent documents, as animal feed with the help of a further huge subsidy. No one is sure about the next port of call, but I have been told that the milk is still going round. That is a clear example of specific subsidies being paid through the Eurosystem. What on earth can we do about it?

The Minister is well aware—because he is one of the nice ones—that I continue to ask such questions. I continue to say, "Here is a scandal, here is a subsidy and here is something specific with names and addresses, amounts and the rest of it". However, nothing can be done.

Mr. Cryer: The hon. Gentleman knows that I was in the European Community for five years. During that time, such fraud was going on. At one point, the EC Commission pleaded that it did not have the money to fulfil its obligations to 200 Sheffield steel workers who had been made redundant and, therefore, could be retrained using money from the Common Market. Those unemployed workers could not get the money from the Common Market because Commissioner Manuel Marin withheld it for 12 months on the alleged basis of a shortage of money. The steel workers were not allowed to collect unemployment pay because they were on an EC course. Therefore, they had to borrow money from the Department of Social Security to eke out a miserable existence for 12 months. That is how the EC applies its priorities. It neglects real areas of genuine poverty for which such money could be used.

Sir Teddy Taylor: That is another terrible story and I hope that the Government have listened to it. I could give the hon. Gentleman innumerable cases. I have pleaded with the Government, saying "Here is problem after problem. What can we do about it?" We all have a high regard for British Governments of all parties. Because we have a splendid civil service, the Government have tried to run things in a proper and agreeable way to help our people and to ensure that money is spent properly and fairly. Here we have a vast and ever-increasing amount of money. I am sure that Treasury Ministers, who are good Ministers, must be worried sick about all this money being spent on silly things when there are so many things on which we need to build at home.

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): Before the hon. Gentleman moves on from agricultural fraud, I put to him this example. I was on the island of Lewis last week. My octogenarian father-in-law had received an extraordinarily convoluted form called the IACS form, which must be one of the most obtuse documents anyone has ever been asked to fill in. My father-in-law, who has two and a half acres, was being asked to fill in the form with all sorts of cartography and to attach appendices. In the accompanying letter, a Minister explained that the form was necessary to counter fraud in the EC.

While I do not support the general thrust of the hon. Gentleman's arguments, perhaps he should suggest to his ministerial friends that it is not necessary for the same form to be filled in by a crofter with two and a half acres in Lewis, a large farmer somewhere in the south of England and an olive oil producer in Corfu because the problem of fraud is scarcely the same in each of those parts of the European Community.

Sir Teddy Taylor: I am sorry about the hon. Gentleman's elderly relative in that lovely part of Scotland. Once again, it is the EC saying that it must try something new to stop the fraud, so it is making all these people fill out those big, complicated forms. Believe it or not, the EC is holding conferences and classes to guide farmers on how to fill out the forms. It is yet another pathetic attempt to say, "We have to do something". As long as we have the sort of problems that exist in Italy, Greece and elsewhere, it is simply a big joke. It will simply mean that many British farmers will fill in lots of complicated forms. It will be good for the paper industry.

Instead of the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) saying, "What about my poor grandfather and what about the poor crofters in Skye?", he should say, "What will I do about the problem?" To stand up in the Committee and complain does not achieve anything. Hon. Members who are just as conscientious as the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North have complained about such matters for years, but the problem only gets worse. The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), who is one of the most conscientious attenders at such debates—he is a good man, but he supports the silly EC—should say "What can I do about it?" If he votes for Maastricht, he knows that the amount of money spent on resources will increase and the amount of fraud will increase. Despite all that the EC can do about it, the spending will get worse. It is very sad.

Mr. Knapman: Will my hon. Friend bear in mind the fact that we voted an increase of funds for the common agricultural policy as recently as the week before Easter? We voted an extra £150 million only a fortnight ago.

Sir Teddy Taylor: My hon. Friend is right. I can think of what I would do with £150 million in places such as Southend and Essex. I am sure that all hon. Members feel affronted when they find that people are being told, "I am sorry, we cannot sort out these little parts on the pavement because the local authorities do not have any money. We cannot attend to cleaning school windows as we should do. We cannot do things for poor people. We cannot increase pensions as they should we because we do not have the money". I appeal to all hon. Members. I am sure that pensioners have told hon. Members on both sides of the Committee, "Why should we pay this extra amount of money in VAT on gas and electricity?" We have to say that they must pay it because the Government have run out of money. The Labour party will say that it is because the Government have made a mess. If we did not have to pay our net contribution this year, we could reduce VAT substantially for many people. The increase in VAT is terrible and something must be done. I am trying to be constructive in making my suggestion.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Is not it part of the bizarre conundrum that—partly in answer to the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson), who was complaining about his poor relation having to fill out these forms—the hon. Gentleman's relation will probably get a lot of money for filling in the form? Instead of farming, he will be filling out forms. A new industry will be created called the filling out forms industry. The money from consumers goes in and people are paid to fill out the forms. That is what will happen. It is an absurd and bizarre situation.

Sir Teddy Taylor: My hon. Friend is right. I do not want to move away from the amendment, but I shall simply make a brief point. I have done the calculations. I hope that the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North will tell his grandfather that, if we did away with the common agricultural policy, all farmers in Britain with more than 40 hectares could be presented with a cheque for £127,000, fully indexed for inflation on 1 January, at ceremonies in village halls. All farmers with less than 40 hectares, including the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North, could get £40,000. Such payments would be indexed for inflation. Of course, the hon. Gentleman will say, "My grandfather does not get £40,000". However, if he adds up everything, he will find that he gets that amount.

If we scrapped the common agricultural policy, we could tell all farmers in Britain, "If you have more than 40 hectares, here is your £127,000. If you have less than 40 hectares, here is your £40,000. You can do whatever you like. You can grow what you like or go where you like." We would have no administration and we would save the Government a fortune.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Dame Janet, I treasure being called a good man by the hon. Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor). That has never happened before. I was a member of the budget committee and the budget sub-committee. When I was a member of the indirectly elected European Parliament, I was in the distinguished company of such perceptive members as Martin Bangemann and Senator Andreotti. We looked at a number of——

Mr. Richard Shepherd: Martin Bangemann is now the Commissioner.

Mr. Dalyell: That is not a generous comment from the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd). Often, there were allegations of fraud. On further investigation, as in Friuli, it turned out that the allegations had been grossly exaggerated and sometimes were non-existent. I am a defender of Brussels on this matter.

Sir Teddy Taylor: I accept the hon. Gentleman's sincerity. If he reads the detailed reports of the Court of Auditors, he will find that they have been through everything. He should examine the spending. I ask him to look in the Library at today's Daily Mail, which gives details of what happens in Greece. Newspapers will not publish specific details without having some objective base, especially a pro-EC paper such as the Daily Mail. The hon. Gentleman must accept that a lot of the fraud exists. It is specific and scandalous. He must know that, if one has a lunatic policy which invites fraud, inevitably it must go on and on.

Mr. Cryer: It is not merely a question of fraud. The fact that the EC is in no way accountable and at one stage removed from directly elected Parliaments such as this one allows it to splash out money without any regard to responsibility. For example, when Spain and Portugal entered the Community, there was not enough room to house all the officials that were required from those two new member states. So the EC sent home 250 well-paid officials on full salary until their age of retirement, when they would receive a reduced pension. The pensions were not very much reduced.

The EC simply spent millions of pounds sending people home to do nothing. It was like an EC mountain of officials doing nothing. That is the pervasive mentality. If people do not know how to handle something they create a huge reservoir or mountain of it and pay everyone to keep it. That mentality pervades the whole EC. It is corrupt not only because it gives backhanders—that occurs, too—but because there is a corruption of thought. It has no clear accountability in spending other people's money.

Sir Teddy Taylor: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has raised those important issues. I wish further to emphasise that what we are saying tonight is in no sense anti-EC, anti-Europe, anti-French or anti-German. I am complaining about the destruction of democracy. When democratic control is destroyed, terrible things always happen. That is the great problem.

Mr. Sweeney: Will my hon. Friend join me in discerning a certain irony? For the fourth time we have a Conservative Government committed in their manifesto to reducing the amount of paperwork for small businesses. They have tried to make small businesses more efficient so that they can survive the recession and thrive in the future. Yet simultaneously we have a steadily increasing burden of bureaucratic intervention at the level of the European Community.

Does not my hon. Friend find it strange that our Government should help businesses, for example, by increasing the threshold for VAT so that the number of forms to be filled in is reduced, yet simultaneously take the nation further towards European union? Regardless of his views on the European Community, which he has made clear since before we joined the Community, does my hon. Friend agree that this treaty is a treaty too far?

Sir Teddy Taylor: Yes, my hon. Friend is right. It is a treaty too far. It will simply make things worse. The trouble is that my hon. Friends who support the treaty know it. I find that almost everyone to whom I speak privately—apart from a few fanatics, whom one always finds—accepts that Maastricht will make the European position worse. There will be more fraud, more expenditure and more involvement. People always say, "But what can we do?"

Mr. Michael Spicer: My hon. Friend has just used the word "fanatics". Is he referring rather indelicately to the two Front-Bench teams, or does he have some other people in mind?

Sir Teddy Taylor: I am not referring to the two Front-Bench teams. I find that when I ask people on the Front Benches who support the Maastricht treaty what good it will do, they say, "Don't worry too much, Teddy."

Mr. Stephen Milligan (Eastleigh): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Sir Teddy Taylor: Here is one of them.

Mr. Milligan: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for putting me in this category. He mentioned fraud and bureaucracy and asked what the treaty would do about them. Does he agree that the strengthening of the Court of Auditors is a useful step forward in preventing fraud? As for bureaucracy, is he aware that as a result of the beginning of the adoption of subsidiarity, in the past year the Commission has reduced by two thirds the number of directives that it has produced?

Sir Teddy Taylor: I appeal to my hon. Friend to look back at what has happened in all our years of membership of the EC. He said that the treaty would improve the position of the Court of Auditors. How will it improve it? It simply proposes to call the court an institution and change its role in some way. The Court of Auditors has published wonderful detailed reports on the most appalling fraud and corruption year after year. Why has the position not improved?

I ask my hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Milligan) to read his Daily Mail today. It is the most fanatically pro-EEC newspaper that one can find. Yet it gives firm and specific details of the most appalling fraud. I appreciate that my hon. Friend is a great enthusiast for Maastricht. Whatever his view of the Maastricht thing, I plead with him to think about what has happened in the past and all the assurances that have been given. If he genuinely believes that Maastricht will make the position better, I appeal to him to consider what happened and ask whether it will make the slightest difference if the Court of Auditors is given perhaps a bigger office, a bigger car for its chairman or more importance.

My hon. Friend mentioned subsidiarity. I do not wish to stray out of order, but I wrote to our splendid Prime Minister the other day about the old problem of Sikhs and their turbans. I asked why he did not use subsidiarity to save the Sikhs from being forced to wear helmets. I asked whether we could decide the issue here in Britain. It matters to the Sikhs. It is an important religious issue. He wrote back a lovely friendly letter, as Prime Ministers always do, saying that he was reluctant to go to the EC in case it took away the powers that we already have in Britain.

If my hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh thinks that Maastricht and subsidiarity will solve the problem, I beg him to examine my compromise plan. I have presented my plan today in a friendly spirit. I am saying that people can have their European Community if it is one without resources. How would the things that my hon. Friend wants to achieve be weakened by that? All that we achieve by giving EC resources is to make things worse for the Community and undermine its spirit.

Mr. Cash: I understand that my hon. Friend wishes to make rapid progress, but is he aware that the European Commission has issued a document entitled "Euromyths and Misunderstandings"? With respect to the issue of turbans or helmets, it accuses my hon. Friend of lying. It says:

> "There is no Community law that makes anyone wear a helmet. Legislation in this area is entirely the responsibility of respective national governments."

Is he aware that I spoke recently to 2,500 Sikhs in the midlands? I am sure that my hon. Friend has spoken to others. They certainly do not agree with the rubbish that is churned out by the European Commission.

Sir Teddy Taylor: I do not wish to stray out of order, but a chap called John Drew has just retired as the boss of the European Commission's office in London. I wrote him a long letter. I said, "Mr. Drew, although I do not like the EEC, I have always thought that you are a good guy." I asked him to sort out the issue of turbans and helmets immediately because what "Euromyths and Misunderstandings" said was a pack of nonsense.

I must return to the amendment. The last time that we passed legislation, we were told about a new exciting fraud dept in the EC which would sort things out. Now we are told that the European Parliament will do the job for us. But we should realise that nothing can realistically be done unless we accept the suggestion in my amendment that the EC should not have one penny to spend. If we did that, the various member states could use their own national resources according to their traditions and practices to stop fraud, or could use the money wisely.

We must put an end to the official conspiracy of silence about the appalling position in Europe. The peoples of Europe are being subjected to mass unemployment. Costs are being forced up for everyone. The poor and pensioners are being exploited. Our trade is being distorted and the fraudsters are prospering. The only realistic solution is to cut through the absurdities by depriving the EC of resources.

[Sir Teddy Taylor]

The second advantage of my amendment and the reason why I hope that the Government will support it is that it would put an end to the tragic unfairness of the contribution system. Hon. Members may have read an article by Sam Brittan, whom some of my hon. Friends think is a very wise man, in the Financial Times entitled "EC—Time for normal budget principles." They may also have read the splendid Library paper on the financing of the EC.

It seems grotesque that, despite the splendid endeavours of the previous Prime Minister to reduce the United Kingdom's contribution to the EC, only four member states—Germany, the United Kingdom, France and the Netherlands—paid anything into the EC in 1992. The Dutch contribution was minimal. The eight other member states received substantial net payments. As the Financial Times said on 13 February, it is little more than a scandal that the two countries with the highest average incomes should be net beneficiaries of the budget.

It is equally grotesque that Belgium should receive more aid than Portugal. I know that many hon. Members feel that Portugal is a splendid country. It has much poverty and needs a great deal of aid. To tell it that Belgium should get more aid seems to be ridiculous. When this kind of money is shared out there is always grotesque unfairness. People ask what can be done about it. The answer is, nothing. It is going to get worse and more unfair if the EEC gets more money to spend.

It seems wholly wrong that we should allow the "own resources squad" to proceed. Britain will have to pay even more—possibly an extra £500 million, although no doubt the Foreign Office estimates will be smaller. My estimate —and that of others who have studied this matter, including the Library—is that Maastricht will cost us, on top of all the money that we are paying, £2·6 billion net this year. It will probably be more because a lot of the money that is supposed to be coming to us is money that we pay traders for dumping food. But the £2·6 billion that we will pay this year will go up by £500 million.

That splendid chap the Chancellor of the Exchequer said just the other day in the House of Commons, when we asked him about the cost of VAT on gas and electricity —a terrible thing—that it would raise £995 million in the first year. We could scrub that tax and a lot more if we did not have those silly contributions.

The biggest problem of all in our new democratic scene is that opinions about the EEC are being distorted because nations and organisations are so deeply in debt to the EEC for its handouts. The Prime Minister of Spain was received as a national hero upon his return from Edinburgh to his own Parliament and the Irish were assured in their referendum that their money will double because of Maastricht. It seems clear that these nations are not looking at the EEC in an objective way; they are looking on it as an organisation that gives them lots of money. When planning a constitution, or how to run a country or a united Europe, the worst possible thing is that some of the countries, and many of the organisations within those countries, should be dependent upon Euro cash. If that situation exists, those countries will be very positive about Europe. That is why countries like Spain and Greece—not so much Portugal because it has always played fairly in this respect—which receive a lot of money, are saying, "We want more money for Europe and more power for Europe", whether they think that, democratically, it is a good case or not.

Likewise, at home, the depleted finances of many trade organisations, research bodies and voluntary organisations are boosted by EEC funding of alleged research and information projects. The next time that hon. Members get a letter from one of those worthy trade bodies saying something nice about the EEC, I suggest that they write back and ask, "How much money are you getting for these alleged projects?" The money is splashed round and the recipients are delighted.

I do not want to make any specific allegations in this regard about the Confederation of British Industry because I have not seen its detailed accounts. I can only say that I am staggered and alarmed that that rather inadequate organisation, which is obsessively enthusiastic about the EEC, recently made strong statements about the acute worry of its major members that a defeat on Maastricht could lead to a collapse of investment and a departure of cash from the United Kingdom. That was suggested in a parliamentary brief which was sent to every Member of the House of Commons on 2 March.

I have secured details of the actual responses that firms sent to the CBI and I am astonished by what they actually said. One company, company A, a major automobile manufacturer, stated:

"Failure to ratify Maastricht or becoming part of a two-speed Europe would affect investment."

The other companies all seem to give a wholly different message. I have been through them all; I have seen them all. I shall just read out few of them. Company B said:

"Investment decisions would not be affected."

Company C, a big chemical firm, said:

"Political considerations are not the main driving forces behind investment."

Company D said:

"Political factors would not have a significant impact on investment decisions."

Company E, a major retailer in the United States, said:

"These factors are not relevant to investment."

Company after company said basically that it did not seem to matter at all. But, despite that, the CBI has put out a wholly different message.

I find it difficult to understand why an allegedly reputable organisation should send us a brief when the advice of its members seems to be different. What should concern the CBI is that, while our trade with the EEC before our membership was positive, the deficit since joining is now more than £100,000 million.

It is the future to which I would ask the House to look. I ask every hon. Member—and particularly the Government Whips and Ministers—to consider whether it is possible that, through this amendment, we can make the EEC better and solve many of its problems. It is a fact that Europe's share of world trade is falling year by year; that our industries are becoming less and less competitive in the world; that mass unemployment in Europe is causing sickening hardship and that the poor are being hammered by the high-priced food regime.

What can we do about it? The simple point that I would make, in what I hope is a constructive debate, is that if we simply carry on, under clause 1, which I want to eliminate, giving more power and cash to the EEC, we shall slip into a horrible crisis.

If we destroy democracy in the process, we shall pave the way for people to march instead of using their democratic rights. I think that a new message of hope would be given to the nation and Europe if Britain were to indicate that the best future that we see for Europe is to deprive Brussels of all funds, to close the absurd, costly and bureaucratic institutions which have been created—including the ridiculous European Parliament—and to scrap, root and branch, its absurd and fraudulent policies.

Many hon. Members will say that that is a dramatic thing to do and will question how the EEC would agree to it, but I believe that if one country says that that is the way it wants to go, perhaps others will follow. To people who say that that is nonsense, I appeal to them to look at the referendum results. People said that the only Euro sceptics were in Britain—because we were an island—and that nobody was bothered about us, but now we find that those feelings are shared across Europe.

Mr. Marlow: I am very much in favour of this amendment and I have been looking at a paper about the cohesion fund, which was issued by the President of the Commission of the European Communities on 1 April 1993—which is significant because it is April fool's day. It says:

"On Tuesday, the Council adopted the first measures to get the Community's Cohesion Fund up and running. The Fund was able to start operations today (1 April). Some 1,500m ECUs will fund this year's commitments in the four Cohesion Fund countries . . . Announcing the decision, Budget Commissioner Peter Schmidhuber said that European solidarity, evident in the quick implementation of the Fund, had a vital role to play in solving Europe's dire economic problems."

It has happened; the EEC is spending money on the cohesion fund before we have ratified the treaty. For goodness sake, at the very least, I hope that my hon. Friend's amendment when we support it later this evening will stop the boondoggling that is going on at the moment.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Of course it is scandalous; it is shocking, dreadful and contrary to all the principles of democracy. What can my hon. Friend do about it? I would say that all he can do is support my amendment and take away the funds. As a democrat, my hon. Friend is quite rightly agitated about it.

There are other scandals. I received a letter from the Consumers Association this morning. Consumers pay in the shops 64p for 250 g of butter. The proper price throughout the EEC is 29p. I am furious about that; it is shocking and scandalous. My poor constituents pay 68p for a kilo of sugar; they should be paying 33p. Steak mince is £2 per pound when it should be £1·10. Lamb chops, which a lot of people still buy, cost £3·10 per pound instead of £2·70. Casserole steak costs £2·40 instead of £1·50. That makes me angry.

What can we do about it? We are putting up food prices at the present time and not bringing them down because of things like the green pound. Sadly, even super-conscientious Ministers like those we have in the Treasury can do nothing about that. They must know that the position in Europe is getting worse and worse, and something must happen. My amendment provides the possibility of new hope. It would give a new message of hope to the nation if we could show the way in which we want to go.

If we were to scrap the own resources clause it might be argued by Ministers that other key decisions would remain untouched and nothing much would happen as a result of passing the amendment. But surely if we took that step to give a sign of how we wish to proceed as a nation, we would send a clear and unambiguous message of our determination to save Europe from the EC. I do not want my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General to say that the amendment does not achieve what the hon. Member for Southend, East wants, and that even if we scrap the own resources clause, we will still have to pay some money. We should not take trouble with that nonsense as we want to know whether it would be good or bad for Europe to scrap the own resources provisions.

The saddest part of our debates on Maastricht has been to see how the vast majority of hon. Members simply do not want to listen to the arguments. They know that the Maastricht treaty will entangle us further in the economic shambles of the EC, but, for a variety of reasons, they can see no alternatives. My amendment provides an opportunity for us to take a new path that will destroy not the EC, but the nonsenses of the EC. It will not undermine Brussels, but will destroy the corruption, evil and fraud. We should say that the sort of EC that we want is an EC of co-operation, friendship and understanding, but no cash—that is the way forward.

The mere fact that we are able to discuss the subject before the final curtain falls on British democracy and freedom is, in itself, a bonus. I hope that the Government will think about my proposition and not simply reject it out of hand. I hope that they will not use that silly form of words and say that if they accept the amendment, something else will happen. Should not the House of Commons, which knows that the EC is plunging deeper and deeper into a huge economic mess and democratic disaster, state what this country can do?

The way forward is to have a Europe without resources. I hope that the Government will say that that is what they want, with everyone united. We should do away with the party wrangles and should not have Tory blaming Labour and Labour blaming Tory. We know that there are some hon. Members—Labour, Conservative, and even some Liberal Democrats—who are unhappy about the way in which the EC is going. Let us have a united policy for once, do away with the wrangling and say that the way forward is a united path towards a Europe without resources, fraud and corruption. We should have a Europe of friendship and co-operation and I hope that the Government will give 100 per cent. support to that objective.

Mr. Spearing: The hon. Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) rightly focused on the word "resources". In an intervention, the hon. Member for Worcestershire, South (Mr. Spicer) made it clear that we were talking about the resources not of the House of Commons, but of the British people and, moreover, resources that we make available through our votes on taxation.

As we all know, money means political power, and the two are closely connected. It is no coincidence that we sit as the Committee of Ways and Means. I understand that it was originally a committee on the ways and means of raising taxes to supply the deficit in the Crown's finances to provide services to the country; hence the word "supply". It was designed to supply the deficit in the Crown's expenditure caused by spending over and above the Crown's revenues. Surprise, surprise—the First Lord of the Treasury obtained a central position. Understandably, the Treasury has always had a sort of primus inter pares in British Government. At least, it played that role until it came up against the Commission and the Council of Ministers.

The function and title of the Paymaster General is fairly ancient, but he is not the master of the payments that he makes to the EC. The House, the Treasury and the First Lord of the Treasury have lost control of the expenditure made available to the EC through own resources. The hon. Member for Southend, East gave many examples.

I challenge the Paymaster General to disagree with the picture that I hope to paint for the Committee and, perhaps, for the nation. The hon. Member for Southend, East is right to say that the resources provided to the EC constitute the windpipe or petrol pipe or gas pipe to its power. The fact that is not fully understood by either hon. Members or the electorate is that that money is not voted year by year on the estimates. It is not voted on in the Budget debate, about which everyone, including the media, goes wild. Under the European Communities Act 1972 that money is paid as a first charge on the resources of the Treasury, whether or not it receives a vote. Under that Act and its financial regulations, which are uprated from time to time, we are obliged to pay that money as a result of decisions taken in the Council of Finance Ministers. The payment of the money is not voted in the House, but was decided at one big vote, which we have to follow, willy nilly.

Mr. Cryer: I am sure that my hon. Friend will refer to the big constitutional issues, but will he also mention the comfort issues? Taxpayers are often pinched as they have to pay taxes and provide the own resources of the Common Market. They would be chagrined to learn that a considerable part of their own resources—many millions of pounds each year—was used to pave the way for fact-finding delegations all over the world from the so-called European Parliament. Those delegations do not involve a couple of Members of the European Parliament, but a committee, translators for seven languages, translation booths to ensure that everyone is comfortable, clerks and advisers. Therefore, we are talking about a tour of perhaps 50 to 100 people. It is outrageous that, when people in our country are pinched and poverty stricken, that money should be scattered to the winds by comfortable Eurocrats and Members of the European Parliament.

Mr. Spearing: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who knows far more about the European Parliament than I do. I do not think that his remarks are at all unjustified. I believe that translators have a useful role to play in translating documents, of which there are many, and meetings, of which there are even more. That is necessary in order to promote international understanding, of which I am in favour. However, I am not in favour of taxpayers' money going to political parties in the European Parliament to fund not just necessary functions in that Parliament—as taxpayers do for our Parliament in a modest way—but other functions that are unacceptable to many of us in the United Kingdom. To use European accounts in that way involves its own dangers.

Mr. Marlow: The hon. Gentleman has set out clearly how the European Community finances to which we are committed have first charge on funds from the United Kingdom. Will the hon. Gentleman, who understands such matters, explain how the European Community is able to spend 1·5 billion ecu on the cohesion fund before the House of Commons has authorised the treaty that authorises the cohesion fund?

Mr. Spearing: I cannot answer that question. I can only suggest that some good citizen of Northampton—or a representative of Northampton—finds ways and means of discovering the answer and takes the matter to the European Court. I understand that the matter may be covered in preparatory legislation, but one danger of the EC is that it involves many preparatory documents which are contingent on votes that have yet to be taken. This happens time and again in Whitehall. I have even seen Bills about which it is stated that they are being introduced because it is expected that the EC intends to do this or that. In any case, if money is transferred, that becomes a matter for the European Court.

I do not believe that the House of Commons or the public at large realise the extent to which control over money and resources represents political power—both of the House and of the voters whom we represent. Our power is no more than the money at our disposal with which we provide the Government, who are the successors of the Crown. As the functions of the EC become broader and the money going directly to the EC never passes through the House despite growing in volume, so political power ebbs away with it. The power to control the money disappears.

The hon. Member for Southend, East was right. We have been in this position before. Some people think that history is bunk, but they do not realise that what we have inherited was fought for and won. The procedures and powers that we hold from the voters resulted from the struggle against the Crown. That struggle, which ended in the tragic civil war and the glorious revolution, was essentially an argument about money and about who controlled it: an argument about who should raise taxes and about how they should be spent.

Now we are holding the same argument again. Yonder in Brussels there is a great new imperium, a new crown. Some Members—some Conservative Members—are willingly giving away these powers, just as they are willingly giving away powers of taxation. And the representative of the Crown sitting on the Government Front Bench is wholeheartedly in favour of that. He cannot deny it when he winds up the debate.

Some of this is already determined by the treaty of Rome, of course. Under article 199, revenue and expenditure shown in the EC budget "shall be in balance". As the hon. Member for Southend, East knows, they often have not been. The way to control expenditure is to impose a limit on it. I am sure that all hon. Members remember that there was a time when there was to be a ceiling on own resources, and the then right hon. Member for Finchley was going to do something about them when they reached that ceiling. But the members of the EC came to an intergovernmental agreement to provide money over and above what was already authorised. Some public-spirited persons took the matter to court, challenging whether we could supply the money by means of a simple statutory instrument. In the end we did not; we had to have a Consolidated Fund Bill to provide the extra money. The Government at the time had no alternative.

This is yet another example of how expenditure in the EC has left the control of the Treasury and of the House of Commons. If Maastricht is agreed to, more money will depart in this way. As the hon. Member for Southend, East said, the money going through all sorts of curious Community routes will grow and grow. When Mr. Delors talks about an energy tax, we may be sure that he is more concerned about finance than about the environment.

The hon. Member for Southend, East mentioned fraud. The hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Milligan), no longer here, countered that the Court of Auditors will have more power. Year after year we debate that court's reports, which show massive fraud and mismanagement. Treasury Ministers know that, year after year—this happened again only a few months ago—they and their counterparts in the Council of Finance Ministers sign away or discharge this money. So does the European Parliament. Year after year, mismanagement gets worse.

I remember a relevant example from a previous debate. It concerned the European Year of Tourism. I do not think that tourism in the EC needed encouragement from official funds. A great deal of tourism goes on in the EC and in Britain anyway, but 5 million ecu—or it may have been pounds—was given away by the EC for this rather nebulous programme, which was the subject of terrible mismanagement.

For our own expenditure, the estimates have to be passed by means of an appropriation Act—we have to appropriate money for the appropriate purpose. Our Public Accounts Committee then examines what has been spent. I know from experience of the Select Committee on European Legislation, however, that this common-sense procedure can be bypassed in EC matters in a curious way. We hear about the Victorian values of the Conservative party, but when it comes to European accounting Conservative Members seem to have thrown away those values. The Gladstonian principles of public finance appear to have been chucked in the channel.

When regulations or draft regulations come before the Select Committee, we often ask where the money is to come from. Sometimes no money is involved—we are just debating a report of certain proposals. On other occasions, when we ask our advisers where the money is coming from, they say that it is included in a line of the budget. That budget is not even a budget in our sense of the word; it is an estimate of money and of own resources expenditure. But somewhere, tucked in its hundreds of pages, there will be a line about some proposal for some programme or form of assistance or handout or lubrication. So, even though the budget is only observed by the House of Commons, a line in it is sufficient authority for expenditure.

This deserves a great deal of investigation, because all the money comes from own resources. Ours is probably the only Parliament to examine such matters, and even we observe them for only three or four hours a year. Nevertheless, hundreds of millions of pounds flow out in this way; sums of money are shifted around at the end of the year from surpluses to deficits. European financial procedures are nothing like those in this country, and even ours are sometimes not as good as they should be.

As I have said, Parliament had power over the Crown to raise revenue and to spend it, and the two had to be balanced. A further power which the Crown used to hold we did not acquire until some time later—the power to borrow money. According to article 199, the EC must work in financial balance, but it includes a number of institutions that guarantee and lend money. Earlier the Paymaster General and the hon. Member for Southend, East had an exchange about the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development. The scandal surrounding that bank has been well ventilated in the media. The Minister jumped up to say, rightly, that the bank has nothing to do with the EC—but he did not add that it is an intergovernmental institution. The Chancellor of the Exchequer is one of its governors. On certain other matters the Foreign Secretary has been saying, month after month, that we should not worry because they will not be dealt with by EC institutions; they will be dealt with intergovernmentally, as though that meant that the Government had a complete grip on them. But if the intergovernmental institution of the EBRD is any guide to the other intergovernmental parts of the treaty, heaven help us. And all this was going on in London less than a mile from the Treasury—yet Treasury Ministers could not stop it.

The European Investment Bank, however, is an institution of the EC provided by the treaty of Rome. Its protocol tells us that Ministers from our Government will be nominated—or at least one of them will be—to serve on the board of governors. For all I know, the Paymaster General may be nominated, but it may be the Economic Secretary or the Financial Secretary. Perhaps the Paymaster General will tell us.

The European Investment Bank lends money for all sorts of enterprises. Its directors, who are bankers—I hope that they are better than some bankers that we have recently heard about—can grant those loans. Article 6 of the protocol setting up the EIB states:

> "The Board of Governors may, acting by a qualified majority on a proposal from the Board of Directors, decide that Member States shall grant the Bank special interest-bearing loans if and to the extent that the Bank requires such loans to finance specific projects and the Board of Directors shows that the Bank is unable to obtain the necessary funds on the capital market on terms appropriate to the nature and purpose of the projects to be financed."

That is a wonderful banker's dream. If money cannot be obtained on the free market, it will be taken by raising a loan, presumably by running around the Governments of member states. I understand that that is what the EIB is about. It does not only raise money and appropriate finance for grants and funds but has a mechanism for raising loans.

I understand that the EIB recently opened a new fund of about £60 billion of credit. The Paymaster General, whose name I hope is associated with permission for that, may be able to tell us about it. Unfortunately, for reasons that I deplore, I do not think that the proposal will be debated by Parliament. The bank has recently expanded its activity and the Government will oversee that if they can —but the precedents are not too good.

Sir Teddy Taylor: The Government are against any kind of state funding, so I am sure that they will be interested in the EIB's provision of £1·6 billion, a huge amount, for that ridiculous white elephant, the channel tunnel. Has the hon. Gentleman read about the horrible economic mess that the tunnel is in, and does that loan not seem ridiculous in view of our law which says that no public money will be provided for the channel tunnel no matter what kind of mess it gets into? However, this silly EIB has provided £1,600 million. That is a heck of a lot of money that could have been used for more sensible purposes.

Mr. Spearing: Own resources can be used by the EC's central institutions in all sorts of ways almost at the drop of a hat at some vague meeting whose participants decide to spend our money. I do not think that it is within the remit of the Public Accounts Committee to look at how all that money is spent. That is political power for Europe. It is unaccountable and in a sense it is fleecing our taxpayers.

Alas, Parliament has voted away its powers to oversee that, and a majority of Conservative Members are advocating that we do the same again. How they can claim to be democrats I do not know. Do not they understand the basis of political power in the modern world? Much of it is money and permission to spend it is being given away, and by the Treasury, of all corporate organisations, which is chasing local authorities and old people and cutting everywhere. The mailbags of Conservative Members must be full of letters about that, but they do not seem to worry about the EC. They throw away power and suggest that we throw away more through this treaty. I do not know how they can face their electorates and claim to be democrats.

Power is money and it is raised by taxing the people. If that is not done by Parliament a supra-national authority will take power. People will receive money illegally by getting grants for this or that. More and more funds will be acquired over there if the treaty is passed. That is why the Committee must accept the amendment.

Mr. Michael Spicer: My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) has done the Committee and the country an enormous service by raising the whole question of the budgetary implications of the way that EC policy is developing. He focused, understandably and rightly, on the issue of fraud; I suspect that the Government will reply by saying that fraud is all sorted out because the Maastricht treaty gives the courts power to impose all sorts of penalties. I shall anticipate what they will say.

I agree with the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) that all the signs are that the governing EC institutions—the Commission, the law courts and, if Maastricht is passed, the central bankers—are singularly inappropriate and certainly ineffective in keeping track of all this money. That is evident from history. Even leaving that aside, it is a questionable matter of principle whether this Parliament and country should hand over accountability and the power to check and impose penalties for fraud to non-accountable institutions in Europe. That is one of the fundamental problems.

As I said to my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East in an intervention in his admirable speech, we are debating Britain's resources. As several hon. Members have said, over the past 10 years Britain and Germany have essentially been the paymasters for this whole business. France occasionally goes into the black, if I may put it that way, but, typically, over the years France has taken money out. Therefore, the term "own resources" is singularly inappropriate. To a Greek, an Irishman, a Portuguese, a Belgian, a Dane or a Dutchman, they are other people's resources. The budget should be called other people's resources, or, better still, British and German resources.

Mr. Sweeney: I am sure that my hon. Friend is aware of the commonly-held belief that he who pays the piper calls the tune. This is an exception to that estimable rule because, although, as my hon. Friend says, Germany and Britain are clearly the leading paymasters in the European Community, they do not call the tune. The people of this country are being denied the responsibility and freedom of choice that usually goes with being the paymaster. The Government are agreeing to a process that is increasingly going beyond our control.

Mr. Spicer: I agree with my hon. Friend to the extent that it is certainly not Britain that is calling the tune. Perhaps it is a matter for future debate whether Germany is calling the tune in the Community. The money that is being handed over, by Act of Parliament, as the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) reminded us, is inexorably increasing. Fraud is certainly one aspect of the matter and the Government will reply to that. The answer to them when they do is that the whole process of accountability for British money is inadequate in the way that the matter is currently presented.

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): Why do the majority of EC countries contribute nothing in net terms while we subsidise countries richer than ours by an amount which is greater than our aid programmes to the entire third world? Does the hon. Gentleman agree that that is because of the taxes by which own resources are financed? There are taxes on food imports, and we will always import more food than the other member states. There is a levy on industrial imports and we carry on more trade outside the Community than the other member states. With taxes like that, we shall always pay in more than we get out.

Mr. Spicer: Indeed, that is the mechanism involved in the process that I have described. We are not talking about mean figures; as my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East pointed out, we are talking about more than £2 billion a year—the equivalent of 100 national health service hospitals.

My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East and others have already analysed the question of fraud very well. What worries me is the inexorable growth in spending that the ratification of the Maastricht treaty will make inevitable. The £2 billion figure involved in what are described as "own resources" is bad enough, but we should remember that, since we first joined the Community, its budget has risen from about £2,000 million to about £50,000 million. Already we are seeing a dynamic growth and, given what is envisaged in the treaty, we are heading towards a worrying position: our resources will be depleted, and not much accountability will be attached to their expenditure.

My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) pointed out that we seem to have slipped from the idea of own resources into that cohesion funding without even ratifying the treaty of Maastricht. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General will deal with that disturbing point. The core of the treaty, however, is the issue of the single currency, which I consider crucial to the question of the resources that will be applied.

In effect, a single currency means a single pricing system throughout the Community; but I do not think anyone has suggested that a single wage system will accompany that single pricing system. No one has suggested that, after the ratification of the treaty, wages in Greece will be the same as those in Germany. Surely, given that people in Greece will soon find themselves paying broadly the same prices as those in Germany while earning perhaps half the wages paid to German workers, there will be great unhappiness in Greece. The same applies to Ireland and Portugal. People simply will not be able to cope. The demand for compensation will inevitably follow.

A single currency means not only the handing over of all control of the banking system and all that it implies to a non-elected central bank, but, inevitably, the handing over of a large measure of budget control. In the past, vastly increasing resources have gone into the Community; moreover, Maastricht and the single currency make a single budget inevitable. That is the truth that my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East has exposed.

What is the pay-off? There are two parts of the equation. On the one hand, Britain and Germany are to be the only paymasters; on the other, Maastricht presents the prospect of a massive increase in budgets and in the resources required—in essence, from Britain and Germany, but possibly from the northern European countries. What will be the advantage for this country? Ultimately, hon. Members still represent constituents here. I feel accountable to my own constituents, and I hope that the Italian politicians will soon feel the same. Surely it is fair for me to ask what benefits my constituents and my country will gain from the enormous step that we are taking—the transfer of resources into other countries' budgets.

Mr. Bill Walker: For nearly 300 years, the United Kingdom has operated a single currency, a single bank and a single economy. Anyone who wishes to see how that operates in practice need only examine the mass migration of people from the less well-off areas to the wealthy areas, and the large transfer of public funds in United Kingdom own resources from the wealthy to the poor areas.

Mr. Spicer: That is a good point. One of the ways in which Governments have tried to compensate is by robbing the successful areas in an attempt to pay for the unsuccessful ones. For instance, great benefits have been stripped from the midlands—where my constituency lies—and I am not sure who has gained any advantage from that.

Mr. Sweeney: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is one thing to strip successful areas to help the unsuccessful, and another to strip areas that are only moderately successful to help, in some cases, the successful rather than the unsuccessful?

Mr. Spicer: That, too, is a good point. As was pointed out earlier, it must be asked whether Britain and Germany—which will be the paymasters of the enormously expanding Maastricht budget—are the countries that should be paying all that money.

Sadly, Britain's income per head is rather low in terms of the European Community countries. Even if I represented a German constituency, I would at least ask whether Germany would be able to afford such amounts in a few years, given its current recession and all the other problems that are hitting it—for instance, social welfare programmes that it cannot really pay for. However, that is not my problem; my problem is in Britain.

Mr. Denzil Davies (Llanelli): I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is aware that even Germany has not done too badly out of Maastricht and the Edinburgh declaration. I understand that the whole of Germany is now to be an objective 1 area, whereas not one part of Britain is to be such an area. Although Germany makes the largest contribution, at least it will be given back a huge chunk. We shall not even receive money under the objective 1 criteria.

Mr. Spicer: Indeed, as a result of all the mechanical problems and the Edinburgh agreement that the right hon. Gentleman has mentioned, it is possible that Britain—which has been the number two paymaster for the past 10 years—will end up being the number one paymaster in relation to a vastly increasing budget.

What, then, are the benefits for Britain? The Common Market was founded on the concept of trade, and I certainly support the continuation of close European trade links. Britain pays £2 billion a year into the budget; moreover, the year before last she bought £10 billion more than she sold, and will probably do so next year. Even in the matter of trade, on which most of us agree, there is a questionable return on all the money that we spend on a vastly increasing budget that will explode following the Maastricht treaty.

Will we gain anything from the single currency, if we decide at some point to opt into it?

Sir Teddy Taylor: It will make things worse.

Mr. Spicer: It may do so, for a very good reason. We saw the effect of fixed and managed exchange rates under the exchange rate mechanism. Some people say that the fact that we were right about the ERM does not necessarily mean that we are right about the Maastricht treaty; I have had that thrown at me at certain meetings, and perhaps my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East has had the same experience. The obvious answer is that the issue is the same one. The single currency is the ERM perpetuated. If it was wrong to link our economy to the economies of others in the short term, as it was wrong under the gold standard to link our economy with that of the Americans in the 1920s and 1930s, on the basis of costs and benefits it must be wrong to link ourselves in perpetuity with the economies of others.

7.30 pm

What will happen to our democratic constitution? Will there be some great pay-off? I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General will take up the fraud argument when he responds. He will say that there will be a new pay-off in terms of accountability and the institutions that will be created as a result of the treaty of Maastricht to deal with fraud. I see, Mr. Lofthouse, that you are becoming somewhat restless. I assure you that there is a direct relationship between fraud and money. This is one of the few debates that have allowed us to focus on costs, and it would seem reasonable to focus on costs and benefits. After all, the costs may be beneficial; there may be good reasons for spending so much money. I am trying to ascertain whether there are good reasons for doing so.

The Government say that one of the benefits is a new approach to the institutions of Europe along with a new approach to the accountability and auditing procedures when adjudicating whether moneys have been spent correctly or incorrectly. I merely question that. I cannot conceive how an unelected, secret sitting, central bank, along with an unelected law court and an unelected Commission, can in combination, using an alien system of law to that of the United Kingdom, improve upon the way in which moneys are dispensed. Such an approach will not enable me as a Member to feel that I can tell my constituents that moneys are being properly controlled and that there is proper accountability.

Mr. Iain Duncan-Smith (Chingford): Does my hon. Friend agree that the reports about the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development that have broken so opportunely recently—they focus on the money that the bank has been spending and the sizeable balance between the amount spent on the marble in its halls and on its offices, structures, jets, flights and visits as opposed to the moneys that it was meant to be lending to the eastern bloc—provide a good example of what happens and of what is endemic within the thinking of administrators within the EEC? It would seem that they take the view that it is not their money that is being spent and they do not care where it goes. The reports provide a good example of an endemic carelessness.

Mr. Spicer: When an institution, whether it is the Italian Government, the Commission, the European Court or the central bank, is not directly accountable to the public, who can throw it out of office, corruption in various forms almost automatically follows. That is not surprising. Indeed, in my view, it is inevitable. The British form of democracy, which we are in danger of dismantling under the treaty of Maastricht, has much going for it. At the very least, it provides a process by which Governments can be held accountable. If the process is taken to the ultimate, they can be thrown out of office if the people do not like the way that they perform. Governments realise that, as do the officials who work for them. Therefore, the system is open. It is one in which change can take place. If there is a change of Government, the newly elected administration can examine the books. That can happen only if there is genuine democracy, which we cannot see even emerging within the institutions of Europe.

The issue is central and crucial to the arguments that reflect the worry about the proposed development within the context of the treaty of Maastricht. Some say that everything is in place already under previous legislation, including the treaty of Rome. They say that we are talking only about continuation. In fact, the treaty of Maastricht amounts to a fundamental break. It pushes everything into an entirely different orbit because of the single currency and what will flow from it in terms of the resources that will be required to manage the consequences.

There can be only one possible justification for the enormous commitment that Britain will undoubtedly make—British taxpayers—in handing over possibly the majority of our money to, possibly, a single taxing authority, a central economic authority, within the EEC. That justification can be found only if we believe in a federal state of Europe. If we believe in a nation of Europe, everything fits into place. If we do not, we should not vote for the treaty of Maastricht.

Earlier there was some banter on the Front Bench about Euro fanatics. My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East came to the rescue when he said that they were not fanatics because they did not really believe in what is proposed. He may have something in that. Indeed, we are presented with the treaty on the basis that, to some extent, we have opted out of it. No one produces firm reasons why we should have the treaty. Instead, we are told that we have opted out of certain parts of it and that the Government have done their best to ensure that we do not experience the worst effects.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East that the majority of those within the Conservative party and in our constituencies—this is certainly the position in the country generally—do not like the treaty. Some think that it is the best that can be done or the best that we can get. No one, with the exception of one or two of my hon. Friends, says that we want a federal state or a united states of Europe. At the same time, no one who argues against our case is able to show us how a single currency, with the legal system that will pile in behind it along with the money that is pouring in as a result of what has been shown to be an inexorable budgetary process, will not lead to a federal state of Europe. It is clear that there is schizophrenia.

My right hon. and hon. Friends who have been voting through all this stuff will not be able to say in future, "We did not understand what was going on." It was reported in The Times yesterday that some had stated that they realised with hindsight that they had got it wrong. The logic has been spelt out during the many days that we have considered the Bill in Committee. It has been presented to the Committee day after day and night after night. No one can misunderstand now the meaning of the treaty. My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East has done the Committee a great service in showing logically just how inexorable the process of——

Sir Teddy Taylor: Will my hon. Friend say to the Minister and to all those in the Treasury that if there is any doubt about the activities of that terrible bank, the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development, they should turn to page 91 of the treaty to read about the new banks that will be set up under the Maastricht treaty, which will cost more in own resources? If my right hon. Friend the Minister reads article 7, he will find that he will not be allowed to write them a letter or to phone them if he is worried about their expenditure. If he is worried about the spending of money, perhaps my hon. Friend will tell him to turn to page 91 and to ask himself what he could do when faced with the scandals over spending that will come inevitably with the new European banks, which are part of the EEC.

Mr. Spicer: I thank my hon. Friend for that information and for having generally raised the issue earlier. I hope that we shall receive some good answers from our admirable and competent right hon. Friend the Paymaster General.

Sir John Cope: It might be helpful to the Committee if I begin by describing—it has not emerged so far—what article 201 does and the effect of the Maastricht treaty in replacing old article 201 with new article 201. The article relates to the system of setting the ceiling for the European Community's expenditure. It is in part a tidying-up change, and desirable as such. The Community should recognise how events have moved on since the previous treaties were agreed. It removes some out-of-date references to the old system of financing the Community by levies on member states.

Most important, it embeds in the treaty the basis of the hard-won 1985 agreement, that the Community should be financed solely by the so-called own resources. I accept the criticism of the phrase, but it has occurred in treaties for a very long time. In so doing, the new article 201 reinforces the 1985 agreement and the decisions that have been made under it, but it also repeats that the system of own resources and the ceiling to be applied shall be recommended first by the Commission and then by the Council of Ministers—the representatives of the member states—by unanimity, through the European Parliament to the member states themselves for their own constitutional processes. In our case, that means an Act of Parliament.

Any proposal to increase the ceiling on own resources requires an Act of Parliament. The Bill is not such a proposal. It does not arise from Maastricht, but the House in general will be aware that, since the treaty was agreed, there has been a meeting at Edinburgh at which it was agreed to propose increases in the future in the own resources ceiling. Such a proposal will need to come before the House as a Bill, and it will do so in due course, but it is not part of this Bill or the article or anything to do with the treaty.

I believe that such a method of controlling the ceiling of Community finances is the correct one. It was obtained by Baroness Thatcher in the negotiations that led to the 1985 decision. It was built on by her in 1988, and is now built in to the treaty by the clause. My hon. Friends who are critical of spending should at least recognise that that is in itself desirable, given the parameters within which we have to live. It is the right method to ensure accountability.

The system for setting the ceiling on European Community expenditure should be as it is: it should be a decision for member states in their own national Parliaments or through whatever constitutional process they have. In our case, it involves a Bill coming before the House. When such a Bill comes before the House is the time to decide whether there should be a new ceiling on own resources.

The article strengthens the financial discipline and control over the Community's financing. Those who want budgetary discipline should therefore support the article and the changes it makes to article 201. I do not pretend that it is doing anything other than reinforcing the controls that exist, but it makes them stronger, because they are now to be embedded in the treaty.

Hon. Members who have participated in the debate have not dealt with the effect of the article, but have made more general remarks about own resources and the financing of the Community. Of course, all expenditure must be treaty-based but, in addition, it must come through the European Community budget. The amendment deals with the raising of money. When we have discussed the spending of money, we have discussed the system for the budget, and do so frequently when changes to the Community's budget are proposed. The system is elaborate. It involves the House but is primarily a European set of procedures involving some of the institutions about which we have heard such as the budgetary control council, which a former member mentioned in an intervention. It is an important committee, roughly equivalent to the Public Accounts Committee.

The third control element is the own resources, the 1·2 per cent., about which I have already spoken and which is a key to the overall control of Community spending.

Mr. Spearing: Will the Paymaster General confirm the thesis that I suggested in my contribution, and which I shall spell out again? The EC budget is not to be compared with our Budget, which covers the raising of revenue but raised by agreements usually running for five years. In addition, they have estimates for spending. Is not the EC budget therefore the equivalent of our estimates and the Appropriation Act put together, and do they not do a different job? Does he agree that whoever authorises the budget automatically authorises the expenditure?

Sir John Cope: I can accept in general terms the hon. Gentleman's description. In a European Community context, the word "budget" is used primarily for expenditure. We use the word primarily to refer to the Chancellor's Budget statement, which is mainly about taxation and the raising of money. We are in the process of altering that. We shall have a unified budget in the next financial cycle and shall, in a sense, be putting the two halves together, which is the right thing to do. However, that is not directly related to the debate. In the European Community, the word "budget" is primarily about expenditure. That is the way it is usually used.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Is it not also true that a budget appropriation in no way inhibits the Community's introduction of supplementary budgets, which can wholly change the original examination of figures and which, except in retrospect, do not require a close examination even by the European Parliament?

Sir John Cope: Oh yes, they of course require examination. Supplementary budgets can be introduced, but, as hon. Members will be aware, so can supplementary appropriations. In any spending or budgetary system, one needs a method by which one can adjust expenditure in the course of a year if circumstances change.

Many references have been made to fraud. They began with my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor), who moved the amendment. In this debate, as in others, my hon. Friend's attitude has been that nothing can be done and that the apparatus and methods to control money and spending in the European Community cannot be improved; the only thing we can do is to spend nothing through the European Community. If my hon. Friend will forgive the phrase, I call that the view of a fanatic of the way to control the EC budget: if it has no budget, there is no problem, and we do not need to control it.

It is a defeatist view. We should not give up the attempt to improve controls on the Community budget. I do not believe that they are as bad as they are sometimes painted, but improvements are desirable and necessary. A considerable amount has been done this year, and, over the past 12 months in which I have had responsibility for that aspect, I have obviously paid close attention to the matter, and am glad to report some improvements to the system.

Sir Roger Moate (Faversham): My right hon. Friend used the words "fanatic" and "defeatist". I suggest that, on the contrary, my hon. Friend's amendment is essentially constructive, as was the manner in which he moved it. In future, the Community must look to a new way of financing its activities, particularly as it faces spectacular enlargement in the years ahead. Can my right hon. Friend name any other world institution that has own resources, yet somehow does not survive because it lacks own resources? Far from being destructive, my hon. Friend is simply suggesting a different way whereby the Community can be funded, directly by this Parliament, rather than have resources of its own.

That arrangement would provide the Treasury and the House with a real means of controlling Community expenditure, where we deem that appropriate, and of preventing fraud. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General will, on reflection, withdraw the rather extreme adjectives that he used and will understand that behind my hon. Friend's amendment is a constructive and sensible approach to the Community's future financing.

Sir John Cope: I used an adjective that my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East applied to me and to others who support the Maastricht treaty.

Sir Roger Moate: Quite right.

Sir John Cope: Every right hon. and hon. Member must decide that for himself—that is not for me to say. My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East made kind references to me also, and was flattering, but he said that those who support the Maastricht treaty are taking a fanatical view and are fanatics—and they include me, because I support the treaty, with particular regard to its effect on Community finances.

From the intervention of my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham (Sir R. Moate), I may have misunderstood my hon. Friend's proposals for the Community budget. I understood that he wanted to take from the Community all own resources, and he suggested no other method by which it should be financed. I am not sure whether my hon. Friend had in mind—as I took it to be—that there should be no other method of financing the Community. That is why I assume that he wanted to take all resources from the Community, as a means of cutting back its activities severely.

I do not believe that it is necessary to take away all the Community's resources to control them properly. On the contrary, we have taken some important steps forward, including those in the treaty that make member states pursue fraud against the Community's budget with the same vigour as fraud against national budgets.

The treaty also improves consideration of the Commission's annual report on fraud. It makes the Court of Auditors a Community institution and gives it the right to pursue its views, which have been insufficiently pursued in the past, in the courts.

Mr. Gill: What my right hon. Friend has just said is absolute nonsense. There is no evidence that the Court of Auditors report has brought any improvement. Ministers come to the Dispatch Box each year and say, "We will do this, that, and the next thing," but nothing happens.

I am sorry to take my right hon. Friend into the realm of practicalities, but for years Ministers have been telling us that beef intervention will be brought under control. We have 10 times more beef in intervention stores than we had four years ago, despite the fact that cattle prices in livestock markets are higher than ever before. One would have thought that would trigger the emptying of the stores, to present the public with a commodity at a keener price. It is nonsence for my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General to expect the Committee to believe this rubbish.

Sir John Cope: I was explaining that the Maastricht treaty increases the power of the Court of Auditors to follow up exactly the kind of issues that my hon. Friend cited and that the Court of Auditors mentioned in its reports of previous years. I support the argument that the Court of Auditors should be strengthened in that regard, and I strongly support the treaty because it will do that.

Mr. Cash: Is my right hon. Friend aware that, when Mr. George Carey, who was for a long time the chairman of the Court of Auditors, resigned, he wrote a letter which some of us have seen, and which I dare say my right hon. Friend the Minister has seen too. It is strongly at variance with my right hon. Friend's assessment of the value of the treaty's minimal provisions relating to control over expenditure and fraud. If Mr. Carey expresses such views, it is immensely difficult to understand why my right hon. Friend—who I believe is an accountant of some standing—could possibly reach a different conclusion from Mr. Carey.

Sir John Cope: He was not the chairman, but a member of the Court of Auditors. From my hon. Friend's description, I believe that he must have seen a different letter from that which I saw. Nevertheless, I recall certain comments made by Mr. Carey at the time of his resignation, and have discussed them. My hon. Friend's description of the reasons for Mr. Carey's resignation does not conform with my recollection of his remarks. The Court of Auditors will be strengthened by the treaty, which will strengthen the fight against Community fraud.

My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East referred to recent newspaper articles about carbon/energy tax and suggested that Community proposals might have something to do with a further resource for the Community. That is not so. It is not proposed to introduce any new own resources as a result of either the Maastricht treaty or Edinburgh agreements. In any case, the funding arrangements could be changed only by the Council acting or making recommendations by unanimity. Any such arrangements would need to be approved by the House.

Discussions are under way on a carbon/energy tax, but it is not suggested that that should be part of the Community's own resources, as those who have read the explanatory memorandum on that aspect will know.

Mr. Leighton: How does the Paymaster General justify the bizarre set of taxes that finance the own resources, wherby we pay literally billions and richer countries pay nothing at all?

Sir John Cope: I will return to that point later.

I was explaining that the carbon/energy tax proposals have been described in an explanatory memorandum, and I do not want to add much to that.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Is it not true that the Edinburgh Council asked the Commission to produce a report for member states on a new fifth resource? I am astonished at the way that the Minister has replied to the debate. I have always had the highest regard for his objectivity. Surely the Edinburgh Council asked the Commission to do this job for it.

Sir John Cope: Yes, but that is not connected with the carbon/energy tax proposals that are flying about and being discussed. They have nothing to do with the own resources of the Community. The preliminary draft for a carbon/energy tax is being discussed by the Community, but those proposals will not affect the own resources of the Community, which is what article 201 and the amendment deal with.

My hon. Friend the Member for Worcestershire, South (Mr. Spicer) described Germany and the United Kingdom as the only net contributors. If he looks at the last Court of Auditors' report, he will see that there were five net contributors to the European Community in the last full year upon which the Court of Auditors reported, 1991. They included not only Germany and the United Kingdom but France, Italy and the Netherlands.

Belgium and Luxembourg were also referred to in the debate—certainly Belgium was mentioned. Belgium benefits considerably from administrative expenditure, which affects its net balance with the Community.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Does my right hon. Friend accept that, over the past 10 years, Britain and Germany have been the only large contributors to this fund?

Sir John Cope: Yes, I certainly accept that, although Germany's contribution is much larger than ours. Nevertheless, I draw the Committee's attention to the very important fact that other countries have recently become net contributors to the Community. We shall discuss later the changes in own resources that were proposed at Edinburgh, but they form no part of this Bill. They will be a matter for future legislation. The change in the balance, in particular the change in the number of net contributors within the Community, will make a considerable difference over the years and will have a dynamic effect, to borrow a phrase from my hon. Friend the Member for Worcestershire, South, on the financing of the Community.

Mr. Richard Shepherd: Has my right hon. Friend had the opportunity to read Sir Michael Franklin's report for the Royal Institute of International Affairs, in which he looks at distributive flows and redistributive elements? When they are broken down to show what each citizen of the new union will receive through his or her national identity, one sees that it amounts to 1,987 ecu per head for those in Luxembourg, whereas Germany contributes, per head of the population, 140 ecu. In 1992, we were, on a per capita basis, the second largest contributor. It is extraordinary that, on that basis, Italy is still the recipient of 10 ecu per head, and Spain 73 ecu, Denmark 97 ecu, Portugal 104 ecu, Belgium 165 ecu, Greece 375 ecu and Ireland 678 ecu per head. That is an insane way of financing or redistributing the wealth of the Community, because it bears no relationship to gross domestic product per head.

Sir John Cope: I have not had the opportunity to look at the report to which my hon. Friend refers, but I shall do so. I cannot comment on the figures, but the general points that I made about net contributions are, I believe, correct and important ones for the future financing of the Community.

Mr. Leighton: The right hon. Gentleman says that there are five net contributors to the Community. There is therefore a minority of contributors, and the majority of states pay absolutely nothing at all. That is grotesque. How does the Paymaster General justify that? It is not fair, is it? Ought not contributions to be on the basis of ability to pay, instead of this mad system that we have at the moment?

Sir John Cope: It is not a question of not paying anything at all. It is a question of how the contributions to the Community and the receipts from the Community net out. All the member states contribute to the Community according to the formulae. All the member states, including ourselves, benefit. Member states receive money from the Community. Furthermore, individuals, and individual companies within the member states, receive money from the Community. The question is, what is the net effect of these two processes—the raising and the paying out of money? It is the net effect to which I refer. The net public sector flows amount to about £2 billion a year, although the amount varies from year to year.

Mr. Michael Spicer: How can my right hon. Friend use the word "benefit"? If we get back only a bit of what we give, that is not a benefit; it is a disbenefit. We have given away money in the process. It is the net figure, surely, that really matters.

Sir John Cope: It is the net effect that matters, and that is exactly what I have been emphasising. The net effect is caused by both negative and positive flows.

Some of my hon. Friends and other hon. Members are concerned about the cohesion fund, and about whether the Community is somehow jumping the gun, in legal terms. I hope that I can reassure them, primarily by referring them to the detailed explanatory memorandum that was submitted to the House of Commons by my right hon. Friend the Minister for Industry on 5 March regarding proposals for the Council regulation. There is no legal jumping of the gun regarding the cohesion fund.

Several hon. Members have referred during the debate to the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development and to the recent criticism levelled at it in the newspapers. Both I and others have pointed out during the debate on the issue that the EBRD is not a European Community institution. It is an institution to which 57 countries belong. That includes the Community countries, but many other non-Community countries are represented on the board of management, are shareholders and are part of it.

There are no accountability lessons to be learnt from the EBRD that are directly relevant to the Community, which has much more elaborate institutions for controlling its finances than the EBRD does. Incidentally, the EBRD's accountability is similar to that for other institutional organisations, such as the World bank. It is that machinery which will no doubt inquire into recent press reports. In addition, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and departmental officials are playing a part in the investigation. That matter is not, however, germane to this debate.

Mr. Robert B. Jones (Hertfordshire, West): It is relevant, is it not, that the Court of Auditors has produced loads of reports on the misuse of European Community funds? Our Chancellor of the Exchequer has endeavoured to get these reports debated properly and action taken, whereas other European Community countries have been singularly unhelpful in trying to get any action whatsoever taken. If my right hon. Friend is in favour of additional resources for the European Community, he must surely accept that its present resources need to be spent properly first.

Sir John Cope: I have talked about the Court of Auditors, and I do not propose to add to what I have said. We were talking about the EBRD, which is a wholly different institution with 57 member countries. It is a different scale of institution.

Sir Roger Moate: We fully understand that the EBRD is not a Community institution. However, it is comparable to a range of other EC institutions. Can my right hon. Friend explain to me and to the British public why Community officials and EBRD officials pay no income tax? Will he explain again for my benefit why they should be accorded that extraordinary privilege? If there is any argument for it, could it not be re-examined, because it is rather scandalous?

Sir John Cope: My hon. Friend must take up that matter on another occasion, because it does not arise out of this debate. The EBRD is comparable to the World bank and to other such organisations, and the matter also relates to other diplomatic privileges.

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): I do not know whether my right hon. Friend intends to go back to the subject of the cohesion fund. He talked about not jumping the gun. He must be aware that, at the Edinburgh summit, for example, the European Community promised Mr. Gonzalez, the Prime Minister of Spain, £7 billion out of the proposed cohesion fund towards a hydrolytic scheme. He was guaranteed the money, out of the £17 billion which he hopes to garner eventually from the European fund, to flood the other half of Spain so that the people can grow even more olives and useless things, which we shall no doubt put into storage. That commitment was given to him in exchange for his co-operation over the issue of the Danish opt-out. Will my right hon. Friend explain whether that is a commitment, whether it jumps the gun or not?

Sir John Cope: My hon. Friend has confused a number of different strands. I referred her and other of my hon. Friends to the explanatory memorandum which was issued on 5 March. It explains in some detail what is going on in terms of the cohesion fund. That point is not relevant to the amendment or to the treaty. What is relevant is article 201, which strengthens the disciplines of the Community by restating and improving the controls, especially over the ceiling of own resources. The total of own resources is a matter to which we shall have to return on another occasion when debating different legislation. I believe, therefore, that we should not agree to the amendment.

Mr. Andrew Smith (Oxford, East): The Paymaster General was a little unkind and ungenerous to his hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor), whom he accused of being a fanatic. The hon. Member for Southend, East may choose to take that as a compliment. He has been generous in this Committee in praising the sincerity of others. A fairer description would be to say that he was very, very sincere in what he was saying about the shortcomings of article 201 and about the system of own resources.

Sir John Cope: I was trying to say that the attitude of my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East in this matter, as I understood it, was extreme. He used the word "fanatic" about some who, like myself, support the Maastricht treaty. That is a matter for him to describe. I entirely accept his sincerity, which is unquestioned. I also pay tribute to his assiduity not only during our debates on this treaty, but over many years, in pursuing his particular point of view on the European Community.

8.15 pm

Mr. Smith: The Paymaster General's search for acceptable, euphemistic synonyms for fanaticism is intriguing. I think that he is just digging the hole a bit deeper. The hon. Member for Southend, East did well considering that he had such a bad cold. I merely shudder to think how much longer he would have spoken if he had not had that cold. However, I wish him a speedy recovery.

The hon. Gentleman argued that supporting the amendment could bring together various groups in the Committee. I am aware of his sincerity, which we have all just praised. However, I must say that a greater triumph of hope over experience would be difficult to imagine. He was on stronger ground when he appeared to suggest that we might cut cash out of the European Community debate. Even that argument collapsed when people realised that he was talking not about his hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash), but merely about money.

In all seriousness, the hon. Member for Southend, East has overestimated the effect of the amendment. I understood him to claim that it would remove every word of the treaty relating to EC finance. He is clearly overlooking articles 199 and 201a, as well as many other articles in the treaty. The amendment would not have that effect. Many of the points that the hon. Gentleman made —this was also true of the points made by the hon. Member for Worcestershire, South (Mr. Spicer)—were really a repetition of a number of points made at length in our previous debates, especially those on the Court of Auditors.

Nobody has more strongly condemned irregularities, fraud and corruption in the EC than the Labour party has or than I have at the Dispatch Box. However, the question that we must ask is whether the provisions in relation to the Court of Auditors and the control of expenditure make matters better or worse. There are a number of respects in which the Maastricht treaty makes the situation better; they are set out in articles 206, 290 and 290a, which give stronger powers to the Court of Auditors. At least now the accounts will have to be fully certified by the Court of Auditors which was not the case before. There are extra powers for the European Parliament to require the Commission to act on the reports and recommendations from the Court of Auditors. There is also the new legal duty, to which the Paymaster General referred, obliging member states to pursue fraud in relation to EC funds with the vigour that they pursue fraud within their own countries.

It is difficult to see how agreeing to the amendment would advance the arguments so sincerely expressed by the hon. Member for Southend, East. Article 201 states:

"Without prejudice to other revenue, the budget shall be financed wholly from own resources."

Is the hon. Gentleman saying that it should not be financed wholly from own resources, but from some further contributions outside the own resources ceiling? I think not. The article also says:

"The Council, acting unanimously on a proposal from the Commission and after consulting the European Parliament, shall lay down provisions relating to the system of own resources in the Community, which it shall recommend to the Member States for adoption in accordance with their respective constitutional arrangements."

Does the amendment imply that the Council should not act unanimously in the matter, that the European Parliament should not be consulted, that the recommendation should not be made to the member states, or that adoption should not proceed in accordance with their respective constitutional arrangements? I think not. Does the amendment imply simply that there should not be a system of own resources? That is what the hon. Member for Southend, East and those who took a similar position argued for. I find it difficult to see how that argument or any of the other implications could be in the interests of the United Kingdom or of the Community as a whole. The effect of the amendment, as well as presumably scuppering the treaty and its ratification, would be to leave us with article 201 of the treaty of Rome under which the present budgetary practices have developed. Even in terms of the hon. Gentleman's own argument, the amendment could not represent a step forward.

I argue that if closer European co-operation and integration are to proceed—there are many deep and honest difficulties in the Committee on that matter—there must be a system of financing those functions. That system can be discharged effectively only at the Community level. If there is to be stability in the management of the Community's finances, a set of rules for sources and levels of finance seems to me to be essential.

We serve our electorates better if, rather than arguing the somewhat theological point about the extent to which so-called own resources are in fact the Community's own resources, we focus on the question of how well the system serves the Community's common purposes and how far the distribution of the financial costs and benefits of the Community are compatible with principles of economic efficiency and of fairness and social justice.

Mrs. Dunwoody: I am listening to my hon. Friend with great care. I take it that the underlying thought behind his remarks is that he accepts the princjple that there will be a growing curve of commitment and a growing movement of money towards the own resources system. Is that the position that those on the Front Bench are arguing?

Mr. Smith: I am accepting that, if the Community is properly to discharge its common functions, it must be adequately financed for that purpose. I do not accept any implications as regards a unitary superstate, which is a concept that those on the Labour Front Bench do not endorse. The purpose of the European Community encompasses certain common functions and we need a common system of financing so that those functions can be properly fulfilled.

In one sense, of course, the Community does not have any own resources—any more than the Government do—and my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) made that point. The income that it derives either comes from EC citizens or is acquired on behalf of the citizens of the EC, just as its expenditure is undertaken in their name. What should really be at issue in the use of the term "own resources" is the degree to which certain sources of revenue are earmarked for the EC budget within prescribed limits, in the sense that member states have each agreed to take on the obligation to pass certain revenues on to the Community.

Mr. Gill: I appreciate that such a course of action is entirely consistent with the hon. Gentleman's socialist principles. Can the hon. Gentleman enlighten me a little more than my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General was able to enlighten me. What would the hon. Gentleman say to his constituents and what does he suggest I say to mine when they discover that British taxpayers' money will be used, through the cohesion fund, to provide roads and railways in Greece, Portugal, Spain, and southern Ireland, given that many of those constituents see a grave need for those facilities in this country? A case in point is the west coast line from Euston to Glasgow, which has about six more years' life in it and will soon be in need of reinvestment of capital running into thousands of millions of pounds. What are we to tell our constituents when the west coast line breaks down and the money that we might have spent on its renewal has been spent on the four beneficiaries of the cohesion fund?

Mr. Smith: First, I shall tell my constituents—as I do—that Rover, which is already selling a lot of cars to Spain, will be selling even more when investment in that country has succeeded in improving its standard of living and bringing it closer to the average for the Community. Secondly, I shall say that we all benefit in common from the advances that common European Community action can effect. Thirdly, I shall tell my constituents that other sources of Community expenditure benefit many parts of this country and indirectly benefit all its citizens. In previous debates, a number of hon. Members representing some of the most depressed areas of the United Kingdom have made precisely that point. Where the Government have not been prepared to act, we have been able to obtain a measure of assistance through European Community funds.

Mrs. Gorman: It is kind of the hon. Gentleman to give way, but can we talk common sense? Is he really saying that his constituents will sleep better in their beds at night if they know that people in Spain can drive about on nice new roads in Rover cars, on nice new roads which people in his constituency would love to have but cannot afford because they are having to fund such improvements in other countries? Good sensible people in my constituency of Billericay have a word for that, but it is not one that a lady can use in this place.

Mr. Smith: The hon. Lady suggests that we talk common sense. Of course, many of my constituents drive

[Mr. Smith]

Rover cars, and the more such cars are exported to Spain and other countries, the more happily they will sleep in their beds because they will know that their jobs are that much more secure. I hold the conviction that the citizens of all of Europe will be better off to the extent that we co-operate more closely in safeguarding our common economic welfare and security. That is the common sense that lies behind the common purpose of the Community.

Let me return to the question of own resources. I was arguing that the term relates to the extent to which the Community can automatically count on certain funding. As long as there is an overall limit on own resources—and the existence of that limit has not loomed large in the debate, although it is material to the way in which own resources would work in practice—and as long as there is a requirement of unanimity, as there is in article 201, the use of the term cannot imply any right of the Community to set its own tax levels or even to establish its own tax base in the true sense of the term.

On the rather more important questions of fairness and economic efficiency, the details of the own resources system have an impact on the distribution of member states' contributions to the EC budget, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) rightly drew attention. In relation to, for example, the VAT base element of own resources, those member states with a relatively high VAT base as a proportion of GNP—they include Britain—will be making larger contributions than members with a lower VAT base relative to GNP.

I argue that, because of that, and because the notional VAT base serves no proper and effective economic purpose in the assessment of EC contributions, the capping of the VAT base in 1988 and the Edinburgh decision to reduce it further with effect from 1995, and, indeed, the reduction of the ceiling on the rate of VAT from 1·4 per cent. to 1 per cent. on a notional basket of goods and services, which is taken as the basis for drawing down VAT for EC contributions, are broadly to be welcomed. Hand in hand with that goes the decision to increase the share of Community revenue contributions calculated on the basis of gross national product—the so-called fourth resource, which will be contributing 40 per cent. of revenue by the end of the century. I had expected the Paymaster General to point to that in answer to criticisms from both Conservative and Opposition Members. There has been a shift towards a wealth-related system of contributions. As my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-East and others would point out, that has not gone far enough: the relationship between net contribution and wealth is still not nearly strong enough. The Labour party is concerned to ensure that there is a much fairer correspondence between net contributions to the Community and the wealth of member states.

The Financial Times article of 13 February 1992, quoted in the Library briefing, estimated that, even after the United Kingdom rebate, in 1992, the United Kingdom would be the second largest net contributor after Germany even though we rank down at eighth in terms of GNP per head. Another way of looking at it is that our post-rebate net contributions to the EC budget in 1992 will run at something like 0·34 per cent. of GNP as compared with 0·62 per cent. in Germany, but only 0·15 per cent. in France and 0·04 per cent. in the Netherlands, while the rest of the member states, some of which are significantly richer than us, will be net recipients. As the hon. Member for Southend, East said, the Financial Times said that it is a scandal that the two countries with the highest average incomes in the Community—Denmark and Luxembourg—should be net beneficiaries. That is absolutely right.

The system must be changed and that will require more significant reforms in the EC budget, upon which we have already touched in earlier debates; most notably it will require further reform of the CAP.

8.30 pm

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): The hon. Gentleman is being remarkably helpful to the Committee. With no disrespect to my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General, he is providing more information which is helpful to the Committee as it reaches a decision on the matter than anything that I heard from my right hon. Friend the Minister.

As the hon. Gentleman has been extremely informative and interesting, will he speculate with the Committee as to why the inequities and injustices in the present system have not already been attended to, bearing in mind that they are so obvious to all? Why are we not debating that rather than the nonsense of this obsolete and useless Maastricht treaty?

Mr. Smith: I support the case for more debate in the House about how we can achieve a more equitable system of contributions and receipts from the EC budget. If the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) is not satisfied with the answers from his right hon. and hon. Friends and he is better educated by contributions from the Opposition Benches, that is all to the good.

Changing the system in respect of the EC budget which the hon. Member for Macclesfield and many other hon. Members find so objectionable will require political will and more determination. He asked why there had not been more change given that the inequities are so obvious. However, I dare say that they are not quite so obvious to the majority of member states that are net beneficiaries under the system. Therein lies the problem.

We must continue to argue for sensible reform. The Labour party will do that and will continue to question the sums being spent on the Community's agricultural policy, which lies at the heart of so many of the problems.

Mr. Leighton: What would my hon. Friend say about the other two taxes involved in own resources—the levy on food imports and the tax on industrial imports? They are both very damaging for this country. They are a way of fining and penalising this country for trading with the rest of the world.

Mr. Smith: My hon. Friend draws attention to a very important matter. While I was able to point to the fact that the GNP-based contribution as a share of the Community budget would be increased to 40 per cent. and that the VAT-based contribution would be reduced, the traditional own resources contribution based on agricultural levies and levies on non-agricultural imports stay at 25 per cent. under the projections based on Edinburgh and the previous European Council meeting.

The case for the benefits to be derived from trade that can take place more freely without such a scale of additional levies and duties, particularly freer trade with central and eastern European countries, the countries of the former Soviet Union and third world countries, is something which all hon. Members should consider. There is real mutual benefit in ensuring that the Community collectively becomes more of an engine for concerted world growth, including growth in general trade, which must be part of any real worldwide recovery, and not simply a fortress Europe that closes its doors to such opportunities.

Mr. Cash: I listened with great interest to the hon. Gentleman's remarks about the reform of the CAP and the opportunity for eastern European countries and other developing countries such as Antigua—from which I have just returned and where I played cricket—and other parts of the Caribbean which have serious problems in respect of entry for their goods.

Would not the hon. Gentleman's argument be a little more convincing if he accepted that it was the failure to renegotiate such matters, as with the single market, in advance of Maastricht which was a reason for not supporting the treaty? Irrespective of the blemishes and flaws in the treaty and its contradictions, the very failure to solve or attempt to solve the problems which the hon. Gentleman is addressing, such as the CAP, is a terrible blight and indictment of the negotiating that took place in advance of the signing of the treaty.

Mr. Smith: I agree that it would have been better if a more persuasive case had been put and more progress had been made in advance of signing the treaty. It is not true to say that no progress has been made. There has been some limited reform of the CAP, but the basic difference between us is how far we see Maastricht as a framework to secure further improvement or how far we see it as an impediment. The hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) sees it as an impediment while I see it as a framework.

The Opposition will be keeping a close eye on the commitment on overall agricultural spending. While the Community budget agreed in Edinburgh shows agriculture taking a decreasing share of the total EC budget, in absolute terms it shows agriculture spending increasing from 35·2 billion ecu to 38·4 billion ecu in 1999. We believe that the escalating costs of the CAP must be reversed and expenditure switched to investment in regional, industrial and training policies to improve the economic competitiveness and prosperity of the Community, including more expenditure within the United Kingdom, for example, from the regional and social funds.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) referred to the role of the European Investment Bank. It is important that we underline the difference between the European Investment Bank and the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development, to which many comments have rightly been addressed.

I wish that the Paymaster General had said rather more firmly about the EBRD, not just that there were matters which the Government would have to consider, but that the United Kingdom Government as shareholders in the EBRD—and, for that matter, the European Commission, as it is also a shareholder—would absolutely condemn the scandalous waste of money involved in setting up that institution. I hope that it is the firm intention to ensure that those resources are in future invested in developing central and eastern European countries and not in enriching the surroundings and standards of Christmas entertainment at the EBRD. I hope that the Committee would speak with one voice in that respect.

The European Investment Bank is a different institution. To the best of my knowledge, it does not, thankfully, have anything like the reputation for extravagance of the EBRD. On the contrary, it has been involved in many worth while projects. When the need for European co-operation to secure recovery and investment in infrastructure and to tackle unemployment has never been greater, the European Investment Bank and the purposes that it can properly serve within its defined role is an invaluable instrument for European recovery which should be used more rather than less.

Unlike Conservative Members, the Opposition recognise the importance of policies at the European level, as well as at national, regional and local levels, for economic and social cohesion so that jobs can be generated and areas that have been shattered by industrial decline can be rebuilt. It is vital that the funds available are used effectively to achieve those aims and that the scope for investment in the United Kingdom is not undermined in the future as it has been in the past by the squabbles about additionality and the Government's reluctance to provide matching expenditure for European Community funds.

The issues and other matters which I have covered can in no sense be addressed by amendment No. 57. For the reasons that I set out earlier, the Committee cannot support the amendment. It would take the Community backwards, not forwards. Therefore, while I share many of the apprehensions which have been expressed about the way in which some parts of the Community's budget are mis-spent, and the irregularities and fraud which must be condemned outright, and which more vigorous action must be taken to stop altogether, I believe that the European Community needs a system of own resources so that it can properly discharge those functions for our common welfare which can be discharged only in common across the European Community.

Mr. Robert G. Hughes (Harrow, West) rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Mr. Cash: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. You will know that amendment No. 426 deals with the European Parliament and with the proposals for the drawing up of the new voting arrangements in all the member states. You will probably know that this evening the Italian people, by a referendum, have decided that they will not have proportional representation——

The Chairman: Order. That is not a point of order for the Chair, as the hon. Gentleman well knows. I call amendment No. 426.

Mr. Marlow: On a point of order, Mr. Morris.

The Chairman: Order. I have already called amendment No. 426.

Amendment proposed: No. 426, in page 1, line 17, at end add

'with the proviso that Article 138(3) is fully implemented in the United Kingdom before the fourth direct elections to the European Parliament.'.—[Mr. Kirkwood.]

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Eric Illsley and
Mr. John Spellar.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Again considered in Committee.

Mr. Spearing: On a point of order, Miss Fookes. In the normal course of events, the next Question would be, That the clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill. As this is, in effect, a one-clause Bill, may I put it to you that we should debate that Question, just in case you might think otherwise?

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Dame Janet Fookes): I have already given consideration to that matter, and I have come to the conclusion that adequate debate has taken place on all aspects of the clause.

Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 67 (Debate on clause or schedule standing part). That the clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill:—

The Committee divided: Ayes 296, Noes 96.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Clause 1, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 2

ECONOMIC AND MONETARY UNION

Amendment made: No. 420, in page 1, line 23, at end add

'and unless Her Majesty's Government has reported to Parliament on its proposals for the co-ordination of economic policies, its role in the European Council of Finance Ministers (ECOFIN) in pursuit of the objectives of Article 2 as provided for in Articles 103 and 102a, and the work of the European Monetary Institute in preparation for Economic and Monetary Union.'.—[Mr. Andrew Smith.]

Question proposed, That the clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Dorrell): This debate provides the Committee with the opportunity, if it wishes to take it, to examine the procedure provided by the treaty and the Bill for moving to stage 3. There are three elements to the arrangements, two of which are provided by the treaty and one which is provided by clause 2.

Article 109j provides for the transitional arrangements negotiated at Maastricht. The article contains four key elements, for those who wish to read it. From the Committees's point of view, the key element is the terms of the United Kingdom protocol which makes it clear that the House of Commons and the country are under no commitment to move to stage 3 unless and until the House has made a clear decision that that is what the country wishes to do.

Clause 2 gives effect to the commitment that we have given that this country is under no obligation to move to stage 3 of economic and monetary union unless the House has passed an Act of Parliament to give effect to that intention. I commend it to the Committee.

Mr. Shore: I am glad that the Committee has the opportunity to debate again what I suppose the Government regard as the jewel in their negotiating crown, the so-called opt-out protocol from stage 3 of economic and monetary union.

We have heard tonight the Financial Secretary summarise remarks that he made very late at night on Wednesday 24 March, when we sat for an unbelievably long time. Our debates lasted from about 5 pm to noon the following day. Naturally and inevitably, few hon. Members of any party attended and there was, of course, no one in the Press Gallery to pick up a word of what the debate was about.

As it happened, there were three consecutive debates which encompassed the evil heart of EMU. We debated the powers, independence and non-accountability of the European central bank; the totally unacceptable 3 per cent. of gross domestic product capping of Government borrowing requirement; and the content of stages 2 and 3 of economic and monetary union.

Those of us who participated in those debates remarked that it was monstrous that one subject should follow another, with the Financial Secretary answering as best he could all three of them, without the Committee having the chance to study the Hansard report of the Minister's comments in one debate in relation to the two others. As they were totally interlocked as debates, that was a disgraceful way of proceeding and a great loss to the Committee and to the country, thus preventing a serious and considered debate that would be reported and made known to our fellow countrymen.

Mr. Cash: Does the right hon. Gentleman recall that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer—who, after all, negotiated the arrangements for the protocol—took no part in that debate? The most that we saw of him in the course of 16 hours was when he popped in for two minutes to talk about some matter or other. My right hon. Friend played no part in debating a range of issues, including white Wednesday: the so-called betrayal of trust that preceded it; the fact that we were subsequently told that there were fault lines; and the remark by my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary that we would enter the ERM when the conditions were right. In fact, only last week, at ECOFIN, Ministers said that there were no fault lines.

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman and the Committee, not for the first time, that long interventions are to be deplored.

Mr. Shore: I recall very well the unhappy events to which the hon. Gentleman referred. I regret to say that, in the middle of that night, I noted with concern the absence of my hon. Friend the shadow Chancellor, whom I am glad to see in his place tonight and welcome. After all, my hon. Friend's powers as a future Chancellor of the Exchequer would be vigorously and seriously affected by the treaty's provisions. It is therefore helpful to have my hon. Friend present. I only wish that the Chancellor of the Exchequer also was in his place.

Our last debate took the form of the Financial Secretary doing his utmost to give reassurances. On studying his remarks, most members of the Committee will find that his reassurances failed to be reassuring.

Mr. Renton: Before the right hon. Gentleman continues, I remind him of his incarnation as Secretary of State for Economic Affairs in a Labour Government. If the then Labour Chancellor of the Exchequer had set the right hon. Gentleman the criterion of a public sector borrowing requirement of only 3 per cent. of GNP, would he not have thought that that was a reasonable criterion at which to aim?

Mr. Shore: In 1967, which is the date to which the hon. Gentleman refers, this country had less than 3 per cent. unemployed and was just returning to a balanced current balance of payments account. It did not have the vast deficit that exists today. In those circumstances, I might well have accepted with a good heart a 3 per cent. of GDP borrowing requirement.

However, when one considers this country's present situation, the fact that the Chancellor's best estimate is a borrowing requirement of 8 per cent. of GDP this year alone, looks at the miserable state of one's fellow countrymen, 3 million of whom are registered unemployed, and considers our appalling trade indebtedness and the continuing devastation of our manufacturing industry, one knows that it would be intolerable and impossible to accept any such constraint now or, I suspect, for some years ahead—unless one wanted to inflict further misery on our fellow citizens and to increase unemployment by another couple of million to squeeze the economy and purchasing power to the level necessary to bring the deficit back into balance.

We faced the Financial Secretary with the reasons for our dissatisfaction and asked him about the nature of our commitment to economic and monetary union. Far from denying it, the Financial Secretary said:

"we accept the commitment to economic and monetary union, to which this country has signed up several times—including in the early 1970s."

He did not dispute the commitment, but he played about with the idea—frankly, we gained no reassurance from it—that, although we are committed in principle to economic and monetary union, it could be that there is some kind of economic and monetary union other than the one in the treaty which eventually we might accept and persuade our European partners to accept, too.

The Financial Secretary was then asked a question which very much concerns us: does our commitment in principle to economic and monetary union and to the first two stages of economic and monetary union, which is agreed by the Financial Secretary, imply our return to the exchange rate mechanism? In reply to that question, the Financial Secretary said:

"It is true that it is Government policy to return to membership of the exchange rate mechanism when the Government believe that it is in this country's interest to do so."

We are therefore committed to returning to the ERM. That is a policy pronouncement of the most serious kind.

The Financial Secretary of course reserves judgment about when the Government believe that it will be in the interests of this country to do so, but I am not convinced that I can see much prospect of it being in the interests of this country to rejoin, particularly if it is an exchange rate mechanism, as we know that it is, which is programmed to be the stepping stone to a permanent interrelationship of exchange rates, leading on to a single currency.

It is precisely the rigidity which has been introduced into the ERM that has made it such an appalling affliction not only upon our country but upon most of the countries of Europe. That, more than any other single cause, is the reason for high unemployment both in Britain and throughout western Europe, the political consequences of which have been obvious and devastating to the Government of France. I suspect that they will also be devastating to the Governments of Spain and Italy.

We are committed to rejoining the exchange rate mechanism, but the circumstances for doing so are undefined, except that we are told that it will be when the Government believe that it is in the interests of this country to do so. We were not reassured, therefore, by what we were told on that occasion.

The Financial Secretary sought to reassure us on another point. He said that, although we are committed to economic and monetary union,

"I do not accept that it is necessary or, indeed, desirable, within the principle of subsidiarity, to remove fiscal policy or wider economic policy responsibility from member states." —[Official Report, 24 March 1993; Vol. 221, c. 1042-44.]

His point was that there was no equivalent commitment regarding economic policy as there was—which he accepted—in stages 1 and 2 regarding monetary policy.

That was not a happy statement, either. When we turn to what we are committed to in terms of economic policy, we find that it is a very considerable obligation. I remind the Committee of those obligations. We are committed to article 103 of the treaty, which states that "Member States shall regard their economic policies as a matter of common concern".

The treaty then makes the point:

"The Council shall, acting by a qualified majority on a recommendation from the Commission, formulate a draft for the broad guidelines of the economic policies of the Member States and of the Community".

After the broad guidelines, article 103.4 says:

"Where it is established, under the procedure . . . that the economic policies of a Member State are not consistent with the broad guidelines referred to . . . or . . . risk jeopardizing the proper functioning of economic and monetary union, the Council may, acting by a qualified majority on a recommendation from the Commission, make the necessary recommendations to the Member States concerned. The Council may, acting by a qualified majority on a proposal from the Commission, decide to make its recommendations public."

That is the old coercive business of collective, multilateral surveillance followed by the condemnation of any country whose economic policies are judged to be against or not consistent with those of the majority. The sins of omission or of commission are then made public and broadcast to the market, with all the uncertainties and instabilities, as a direct means by which to coerce a member state that falls out of line. That is yet another contradiction in what the Financial Secretary told us. The Financial Secretary knows well that the belief that economic policies are a matter of common concern is written into economic policy and leads to reasons why we should conform.

The Financial Secretary then said that we need not get worried about obligations to avoid excess deficit. He said that it was Government policy anyway to avoid excess deficit. Of course. However, when he was pressed a bit harder, he said that 8 per cent. of gross domestic product was not an excess deficit because the Government had judged it to be a proper deficit and that is why they had proposed it to the House. That is fine. However, if the Government are right in their judgment on the matter, an excess deficit is simply what the Government at any time decide that it is and there is no real meaning to the treaty obligation to 3 per cent. of GDP as the benchmark or to its use as the major and central means—not the sole criterion—by which to judge whether an excess deficit has been incurred.

Those are all obligations, commitments and pressures that will fall on us in stages 1 and 2. In stage 2, to which we are committed, we do not have to face the dangers of penalties and fines being imposed on us which we would face if we were in stage 3, from which the Government have got their exemption. However, the pressure is there all the time and we agreed to best endeavours. On top of all that, we know very well that how we proceed in all these matters is constantly to be reported on and invigilated by the Commission and by other European agencies.

Mr. Spearing: To put it in plain language which we in east London would understand, is my right hon. Friend saying in effect that, whereas stage 3 is rigid iron bars, this is very strong elastic, and that we might as well be in stage 3 for all practical purposes? If that is so, the great opt-out, the bit of paper that the Prime Minister came back waving from Maastricht, is not worth very much. Is that right?

Mr. Shore: My hon. Friend has got it very nearly right —[Interruption.] Very nearly. There are two crucial questions. One is whether the Government are right in saying that the legal obligations on us are less than those imposed on the other 10. That is still a matter for some argument. Many hon. Members are not satisfied that it is a lesser legal obligation than that which is imposed on the 10. In terms of political pressure and in terms of economic pressure——

Mr. Spearing: Bankers' pressure.

Mr. Shore: —and bankers' pressure, it will indeed be a continuing, powerful, public and private constraint on all the Government's activities in so far as they depart from the common guidelines set down and the common policies recommended by the European Community, not only for economic policy, but for monetary policy as well.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Can my right hon. Friend understand the attitude of a Labour leadership which finds it perfectly acceptable to abstain, if not to vote with the Government, on powers that would make it impossible for any Opposition party that formed a Government to take radical steps to improve its political, and, certainly, its economic, policies for the future?

Mr. Shore: It has all been said before, but I find it quite simply incomprehensible, not only in relation to a Labour Government. If a Conservative Government had to accept what appear to be the limitations imposed on borrowing that the treaty and its protocols proclaim, they, too, would find it totally unacceptable. As we know, the Government have recommended to the House only this year that we accept a GDP borrowing requirement of 8 per cent.

Mr. Marlow: Further to the point raised by the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), the right hon. Gentleman will be aware that the Government are putting it around among their own supporters—they dare not do it publicly, of course—that these provisions of the treaty are a load of nonsense and that they intend to prevent them from happening. But the treaty is by way of being a contract. What are the chances of the other parties to the contract letting the Government get away with presuming that the provisions of the treaty are a load of nonsense and that we shall not have to apply them in the United Kingdom?

Mr. Shore: That is one of the great dangers. We deceive ourselves—though we do not deceive others—if we think that there is no real content or danger in such treaties because they are unenforceable and simply will not work. My fear is not that we would necessarily reach economic and monetary union. Rather, I fear the damage that we shall inflict upon ourselves in our efforts to get there. Given the present condition of the British economy, that must surely be at the forefront of our minds as a really major hazard.

Very much a part of stage 2 of economic and monetary union is the whole doctrine of convergence and the criteria that are laid down for it. As part of the transitional provisions, article 109j says:

"The Commission and the EMI"—

the European Monetary Institute—

"shall report to the Council on the progress made in the fulfilment by the Member States of their obligations regarding the achievement of economic and monetary union."

Mr. Spearing: Report on.

Mr. Shore: The Commission and the EMI will report on the member states' progress, presumably annually. The matters upon which they will report are the so-called convergence criteria that are laid down in the protocol referred to in article 109j and the extent to which countries are conforming to them.

Those four criteria will become very important, and may dominate future debates in the House. First, our cost of living must not be appreciably more than those of the best three performing member states—in other words, we must keep prices down. That is not a bad objective in itself, although much depends on just how serious the deflationary problems are in other countries. I would not necessarily rejoice if other European countries achieved zero inflation if the price of that was a massive increase in unemployment and a fall in output in those countries.

The second criterion relates to the Government's budgetary position. That refers to the excess deficit. We must conform to the 3 per cent. of GDP criterion—or the approach to it—as laid down in the relevant articles and in the protocol.

The third of the convergence criteria relates to the exchange rate. That must surely cause the Financial Secretary some difficulty, as, clearly, we have to be a member of the European exchange rate mechanism if we are to conform to the behaviour of the pound within the exchange rate mechanism which is laid down in article 3 of the protocol. According to that performance, the fluctuation margins must be observed for at least two years without causing severe tensions.

The last of the four criteria relates to nominal long-term interest rates which must not exceed more than 2 per cent. of the interest rates in the three best performing countries in Europe. Those are very deflationary criteria. From some of the speeches made by hon. Members on both sides of the Committee, one would have thought that the kind of protocols written into the Bill were not the kind that I have described, with their demands about monetary and inflationary criteria, but criteria relating to the achievement of full employment, a balance on current account or to output.

From the speeches that we have heard, we would suppose that all those sensible things had been written in. Not a bit of it. Instead there are the very old-fashioned, pre-Keynesian criteria and the experience that we had between the wars in terms of almost nil inflation and massive unemployment.

I cannot see any attraction in the content of stages 1 and 2, to which we are committed in the treaty by our own signature, and our simply saying that there are dangers and that we must debate those matters but we are saved from the ultimate horrors of the third stage because we have not signed to firmly fixed exchange rates, a single currency, a European central bank and all the disciplines that go with that.

The safeguards are quite inadequate. There is a terrible blur between stages 1, 2 and 3 and we would be fooling ourselves and our fellow citizens and voters if we said that we were satisfied with the opt-out, however great a prize the Government claim it to be.

Mr. John Townend (Bridlington): I welcome the Government's right to opt out of stage 3 and the single currency. However, I am concerned about whether the Government will ever take advantage of the opt-out. As I see it, for the Government to opt out of a single currency, they would have to go against their own policy, because they have made it clear time and again that it is Government policy that we should be at the centre of Europe.

If we exercise our opt-out and our colleagues in Europe move towards a single currency, how can we be at the centre of Europe when we are one of only a few who have not accepted the single currency? That worries me. I cannot help but wonder whether the opt-out was included to get the Bill through the House and receive the approval of the British public.

I am in favour of an economic Community. I was really upset when the "E" was dropped from the EEC without a by-your-leave. I am also in favour of the single market. However, I am opposed to full monetary union.

Monetary union without a single currency will not work. It will be impossible to get the various economies of the various disparate countries in the Community to converge. The ERM, as the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) made clear, was meant to be the forerunner of monetary union and a single currency. What a disaster that has been.

Earlier this year, we saw the effect of our being forced, by our membership of the ERM, to fix our interest rates, not at a level appropriate for the British economy, but at a level appropriate for the German economy, because the German and British economies were diverging. Therefore, we had to have interest rates at excessively high levels when this country was going deeper and deeper into recession.

It was the deepest and longest recession this century. How many jobs were lost and how many businesses went bankrupt because we were stuck in the exchange rate mechanism? I must remind hon. Members that those who said last summer that this policy was disastrous for our country were told that they were economically illiterate. Four weeks later, the Government were proudly telling us that we were out of the exchange rate mechanism and that we could fix our interest rates at appropriate levels for the British economy. Interest rates came down rapidly by four per cent.

If we were still in the exchange rate mechanism, our interest rates—like the interest rates of France—would probably be much higher. Far from seeing the green shoots of recovery, the United Kingdom would not just be in recession; it would be in economic collapse.

Mr. Ian Taylor: My hon. Friend is missing one crucial point—no country can set its interest rates for its domestic circumstances without paying attention to what is happening in other countries within an internal capital market. There are no restrictions on the movement of capital, so capital will go to the market which has the best hedge against inflation and the best real rate of return. That is precisely what is happening today in the market, although we are not in the exchange rate mechanism.

Interest rates have fallen. The currency has also fallen, and there are considerable inflationary concerns about that fall. It is a trade-off. Although there was a disequilibrium because of the problems in Germany, the reality is that the exchange rate mechanism has been a success since 1979. It is a great pity that the United Kingdom did not join it earlier.

Mr. Townend: With respect to the hon. Gentleman, that is not true. A country can fix its interest rates at a level appropriate to its economy as long as it is prepared to take the consequences on the exchange rate. If one believes in floating exchange rates, it is practical to fix interest rates to suit the United Kingdom.

Mr. Budgen: Is not my hon. Friend the Member for Esher (Mr. Taylor) falling into the trap into which so many people fall? He is saying that, because some prices are affected, it has an effect on inflation. Surely the message that was drummed home so often through the mistakes of the 1970s is that there is only one cause of inflation—an increase in the money supply. We should not confuse the cause of inflation with a relative change in prices that may occur when wages, the exchange rate or any of those factors affect some prices but not all of them.

Mr. Townend: My hon. Friend is right. If my hon. Friend the Member for Esher (Mr. Taylor) was correct, we would have the same interest rates as France. Of course that is not true. The great economic successes of the Conservative Administration were based on a floating exchange rate, monetary policy and controlling public expenditure. As soon as we moved from monetary control to an exchange rate policy, and as soon as we started giving in to every pressure group by increasing public expenditure and increasing the deficit, we got into trouble.

It is not simply the United Kingdom which has suffered through the exchange rate mechanism. We have seen what happened in Ireland, Spain and Italy. We have also seen what happened in France, which is the birthplace of the EEC. France, which is the most communautaire country in Europe, has been driven deeper into recession because it had to fix its interest rates at a level appropriate to Germany. When France has an inflation rate of something like 2 to 3 per cent. and a fairly successful economy, it is nonsense that it must have real interest rates at a record level which is creating more unemployment and driving the country into deeper recession.

Let us be honest: the whole of Europe, apart from the United Kingdom, is moving into recession as a result of the failure of Germany's economic policy. That failure is being transferred to the rest of the countries in the Community because of the exchange rate mechanism.

It would be disastrous if we had to rejoin the exchange rate mechanism. We can never be sure that in future, even if our economies start to converge with Germany, they might then start to diverge. If that happened, we would be in the same position as we were last summer.

Mr. Budgen: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Townend: I shall simply finish making this point. The Government should have learnt the lesson from the damage which was done to our economy. They should not be afraid of upsetting our European partners. They should say honestly that they do not believe that we should go back into the exchange rate mechanism.

Mr. Budgen: I am sure that my hon. Friend will concede that there is a serious risk that either by political or by legal pressures, we shall be forced back into the ERM if the Maastricht treaty is ratified. Do we conclude from his powerful and moving oration that he proposes to vote against clause 2 stand part?

Mr. Townend: I do not know, because by voting against clause 2, I would be voting against the Government's opt-out, with which I agree. But I assure my hon. Friend that I certainly shall vote against the Third Reading of the Bill, because I believe that it would be disastrous for Britain.

If we move to a single currency, inevitably we shall move towards a federal united states of Europe.

Sir David Mitchell (Hampshire, North-West): As only one country within the EC at present falls within the set of criteria for convergence which we have to meet, does my hon. Friend seriously suggest that there will be a sufficiently large block of countries which will fit the criteria for moving forward to stage 3 and a single currency? Is that a reality or a dream?

Mr. Townend: I agree with my hon. Friend that it is most unlikely to happen. It is interesting that many hon. Members on this side of the Committee who intend to vote for Maastricht, including many members of the Government, have said when they have tried to persuade me to vote for the Bill, "John, I don't know why you're worried, because it is never going to happen." The whole thrust of the Maastricht treaty is economic and monetary union. If economic and monetary union will not be practical in the foreseeable future, and it will be impossible to meet the criteria, why are we pressing on with this useless Bill?

I have always believed passionately in the nation state. We are an island country. While I strongly support our membership of an economic community, I am opposed to giving up our sovereignty and moving step by step towards a federal united states of Europe in which more and more decisions would be taken in Brussels, and the House of Commons would progressively be no more than a county council.

I am even more appalled—I hope to catch your eye in a later debate, Dame Janet—that we are making a major constitutional change when the British people have not had the opportunity to express their views. When every major party and its leaders support a particular policy, a general election is no way to find the view of the British people. They have no way of expressing it. The political and bureaucratic classes and big business men in Europe and Britain all seem to have been caught by the dream of a federal united states of Europe. It is strange that they think that it will work. Europe is made up of various countries with various languages and different cultures. When we look across Europe, we see that the multicultural, multilingual and multi-religious federations of the former Soviet Union and Yugoslavia are breaking up. It will never work. The whole treaty is flawed. I strongly urge hon. Members to vote against it.

Mr. Leighton: As the hon. Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) said, clause 2 is the essence of the Bill. It deals with economic and monetary union. It is at the heart of the centralising drive of the Bill. There is no subsidiarity in monetary policy. Short-term interest rates will be the same in Glasgow as in Naples, Berlin or Lisbon. The unaccountable central bank will be by far the most powerful institution in the Community.

Unprecedented powers will be surrendered to an autarchy of central bankers and it will be unlawful to seek to influence them. I find that prospect appalling. The fact that the Labour party is in favour of it is inexplicable. In fact, it is not only in favour, but gushingly enthusiastic about the idea.

There has been a role reversal, because the Conservatives say that they have an opt-out—I do not know how realistic that is having listened to the hon. Member for Bridlington. The Danes also say that they have an opt-out and the Germans need another vote in both Houses of their Parliament.

Mr. Rowlands: My hon. Friend just said that the Danes have an opt-out, but one of the consequences of the Edinburgh summit was their formal notification to the other Governments that they have opted out of economic and monetary union. They have already opted out.

11.15 pm

Mr. Leighton: I congratulate the Danes. The Labour party seems to have no such hesitations, because, from what I have heard, it cannot wait to get economic and monetary union. I find that inexplicable. Such behaviour is a recent aberration because it is contrary to policy over the years.

At the time of the 1975 referendum, the Harold Wilson Government issued a manifesto that was sent to every household. It stated:

"There was a threat to employment in Britain from the movement in the Common Market towards economic and monetary union."

That Government recognised the threat.

"This could have forced us to accept fixed exchange rates for the pound, restricting industrial growth and so putting jobs at risk. This threat has been removed."

My right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) will recall that in 1978 the Labour Government published a White Paper to explain their decision not to join the European monetary system.

Those documents are history, but let us consider a more recent publication, "Meet the Challenge: Make the Change". Everything was put in the melting pot and that document contained the Labour party's definitive views. On Europe, it stated:

"We see the path to future progress as being one of closer and closer co-operation rather than an attempt to create a European union."

The Labour party did not want European union, but we are now discussing a union treaty. It also stated:

"We oppose moves towards a European monetary union, which could further impede progress in this area."

It also made it clear that the Labour party was against joining the exchange rate mechanism. That document contains the latest policy statement of which I am aware.

The Labour party has stood on its head on Maastricht. Its behaviour has been undignified. There is a limit to how many times it can do that, because if it changes its policy so often, can anyone believe what it says?

Mr. Budgen: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Leighton: I believe that the hon. Gentleman wants to help me, so I will give way.

Mr. Budgen: The hon. Gentleman should accept some reassurance from me. His party has stood on its head on a number of occasions, but my party has stood on the fence. At least his party has taken a view about the advantages and disadvantages of the single currency, but apparently it is impossible for the Government to decide what those might be—they leave open the possibility of either going in or not. It seems that even the experience of 16 September is not conclusive for the Government; they need some other indication of what is to be in the national interest before they decide to adopt the single currency. It seems to be almost impossible to provide evidence that will enable the Government to make up their mind.

Mr. Leighton: The hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) referred to evidence, and he was right to do so as I have heard no explanation for the change in the Labour party's view.

Mrs. Dunwoody rose——

Mr. Leighton: I do not want to keep giving way, but I shall give way to my hon. Friend as she played a leading part in Labour party councils on such matters. Therefore, I would be grateful to hear from her.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Does my hon. Friend accept that some of us no longer play a part in Labour party councils precisely because our views were clear cut and we asked questions that were found unacceptable by those who now propose to speak on behalf of the Labour party? I shall ask my hon. Friend a simple question: does not he find it deeply saddening that there has been no clear debate of the pros and cons of the movement towards the monetary system and monetary controls, either among the Labour party or the electorate? There has been a series of slippery smudges that have confused and misled, not only his constituents, but many of mine, irrespective of their political complexion. Is not that the saddest condemnation of Her Majesty's official Opposition?

Mr. Leighton: I know that my hon. Friend was a member of the national executive council for many years and represented us in European matters and, like her, I have heard of no proper explanation. I have heard of no intellectual justification for the change. Perhaps someone thought that it was a clever electoral move and a way to win votes. If that was the case, it was a mistake as we know from our private polls that at the last election there were two issues on which support for the Labour party was well behind that for the Conservative party. One of those issues was the economy and the other was Europe. Therefore, the policy did not help us.

I have searched through all the files that I have kept over the years for any justification or explanation of the change. I do not know whether my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith), who is having an interesting conversation with his colleague, published any articles of an intellectual nature to explain the changes. I have looked through my files and could find only one such article, which was published by my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North, for whom I have great respect and affection. He is one of the Labour party's thinkers. In the Tribune newspaper on 10 November 1989 my hon. Friend said:

"No ifs or buts, it must be the ERM."

That is the only intellectual case for the policy that I can find. Perhaps my hon. Friends the Members for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) and for Oxford, East published arguments —I do not know.

My hon. Friend continued:

"We must have currency stability".

According to him, that was why we had to join the ERM. He said:

"ERM participation removes currency speculation from the list of the immediate worries faced by the British Government—especially a Labour Government."

He continued, lyrically:

"Entry enables us to wrap the strength of other central banks of Europe around our currency to defend against speculation."

The idea was that we would join the ERM, the pound would be put in an emergency ward and all the other central banks would wrap themselves around the currency so that we would have no more problems and speculation and would not have to worry about the pound.

Mr. Dalyell rose——

Mr. Leighton: I shall give way to my hon. Friend, for whom I have great respect, when I have made my point.

Mr. Dalyell: It was not my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn).

Mr. Leighton: I have made a mistake, so I shall give way.

Mr. Dalyell: My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North is lyrical about many things, including rain forests, Cuba and Nicaragua, but I have not heard him being lyrical about the EC.

Mr. Leighton: I am referring to my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith), for whom I have great respect and affection, who was a predecessor of my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East as an Opposition spokesman. I made a mistake with the constituency, for which I apologise.

In any case, my hon. Friend said:

"It means that the Government can concentrate on the crucial task of rebuilding the domestic economy without having to devote time, attention and energy to defending the pound."

So the ERM would take care of all the pound's problems. I know of no other intellectual justification besides this one of the view that we have adopted.

Referring to speculation, my hon. Friend said:

"ERM membership virtually removes that problem."

Mr. Richard Shepherd: I thought that I heard the hon. Gentleman say that the article was written in November last year, after the events of September. Have I got it wrong?

Mr. Leighton: The article appeared on 10 November 1989.

On the day the policy was announced, 15 October 1990, I said—it is recorded in Hansard—

"I prophesy that he has it wrong and that the pound will not stay at DM2·95."—[Official Report, 15 October 1990; Vol. 177, c. 936.]

Exactly a year later, I said:

"It is always dangerous to prophesy, but I am prepared to do so and say that it will not be possible to hold the pound at DM2·95."

I should have thought that those of us who got it right would be listened to now rather more carefully, but I do not think we will be. And those who got it wrong should apologise.

The ERM was a dummy run for the single currency; it was a taster. When industry was crying out for lower interest rates, those rates were 4 per cent. higher than they needed to be, to try to defend the indefensible. They tipped the country into recession, in fact. The ERM made more than another 1 million people unemployed. Growth, employment and prosperity—all were subordinated to pegging the pound in the ERM.

Yet, after all the pain, all the suffering, all the lost jobs, all the houses repossessed, and all the businesses closed down, the policy failed and we were blown out of the ERM. The Government's policy collapsed in spectacular and cataclysmic failure, but not before they threw away the country's entire foreign exchange reserves. In short, the policy ended in ignominy and humiliation.

It was not only the Government's policy that failed, however. Our policy failed, too. It was a bipartisan policy, and right up until the day before black Wednesday Labour party spokesmen were saying that there should be no realignment. So when the Government's entire economic policy collapsed, the Labour party derived no advantage from it because we had foolishly backed that policy.

The question is: have we learnt anything? It is doubtful that we have. It is difficult to know, because the people who supported the policy, who got it wrong, have not commented on its failure. They have remained silent, perhaps because of their embarrassment.

If we support the treaty, and economic and monetary union, and a single currency, we must be willing to rejoin the ERM. In other words, we must be prepared to make the same mistake all over again. Why cannot we grasp the simple truth that exchange rates must reflect economic fundamentals? If economies diverge, as those in the Community are diverging, so will their currencies. A strong currency reflects a strong economy, not the other way around. We cannot achieve a strong currency by passing a resolution to that effect, or by artificially pegging it to a nominal exchange rate. The exchange rate is no more than the price of a currency compared with that of other currencies.

If countries' economic performance or rates of inflation vary, so will the value of their currencies—their exchange rates. There have just been movements in the exchange rate between the Japanese yen and the American dollar. Problems arise if such movement is not allowed to take place, as we saw recently in east Germany. If country A links its currency to country B which has lower inflation and higher productivity, country A's currency will be continually overvalued and the currency of country B will be undervalued. A's exports become dearer, imports become cheaper, the balance of payments deficit grows, factory closures proceed apace, and there is unemployment.

Countries can join a single currency mechanism only if there is real convergence, if their economies are working in the same way and have similar rates of growth, wealth, employment, investment, productivity and labour costs. The treaty does not mention real convergence. As it is a monetarist treaty, all its criteria are monetary. It talks about fiscal deficits and Government debt, rates of inflation and about joining the narrow band of the ERM. There is hardly a word in the treaty about employment.

11.30 pm

Mr. Winnick: There is some reference to employment, but it is so small that I can understand my hon. Friend not noticing it. Does he agree that there is a great contrast between the passing, slight reference to social harmony, employment and other matters and all the details in article 104C which sets out, section by section, the penalties that will be imposed on member states if they exceed the 3 per cent? Therefore, it is clear that the treaty is a recipe for higher unemployment and more deflation. The ERM will seem insignificant compared with the hardship and misery that will result if economic and monetary union is brought about.

Mr. Leighton: That is why the convergence criteria are outrageous to a party of the left. We are about to enter stage 2, which will require budget deficits of 3 per cent. and Government debts of 60 per cent. That will mean huge cuts in public expenditure throughout the Community. Maastricht means co-ordinated deflation, just when the opposite is needed. Officially, unemployment in the Community is over 11 per cent. The average in the Community is higher than in this country, but in real terms it is much higher. Next year there will be zero growth. The European Community is the world's unemployment blackspot and it will get worse because in stage 2 we will try to reach the convergence criteria.

As I say, there will be co-ordinated deflation. That will mean great upheavals and much suffering. It will destroy several Governments. It has already destroyed the Mitterrand Government. They had 10 years in which to show what a socialist Government could do, but they have been destroyed because they linked up with the ERM. The same thing will happen to the Spanish Government. Surely the level of Government deficit should be decided by the Government of the day according to the prevailing circumstances. It is ludicrous and arrogant to lay down Government deficits in an international treaty. I have heard of the end of history, but this is the end of economics because the subject cannot be discussed: it is laid out in a treaty.

Who wins elections will not matter very much. It will not matter whether it is the leader of the Conservative party or the leader of the Labour party because if the Bill is passed we will know what the economic policy is to be. We all know. The deficit must not be more than 3 per cent. The Government debt must not be more than 60 per cent. Inflation must be within 1·5 per cent. of the best, and interest rates within 2 per cent. of the best, and we must have successful membership of the narrow band of the ERM. That will be policy. It will not matter whether the right hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major) or my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) wins the election. It will not matter a damn, or a row of beans. This international treaty, which is legally enforceable, will lay down the policy.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: We come back to the fundamental reason why so many hon. Members oppose the Maastricht treaty. It is because it is a treaty of federal union, despite protocols and opts-outs, which are untested. We are being led, step by step, with a light blindfold around our eyes, down the road to a federal Europe.

Mr. Leighton: The treaty means that, at the next general election, policy cannot be affected by voting. Our democracy will be devalued and undermined and politics will become redundant, pointless.

Mr. Winterton: What about politicians?

Mr. Leighton: The politicians in the House of Commons, who have been elected, will not be allowed to influence what is happening.

Mr. Wilkinson: Will the hon. Gentleman consider this point? Perhaps we are experiencing a foretaste of what he has warned us about for the future, in as much as we have a de facto coalition Government who, on the matter of European union, are driven by an extraordinary consensus on the line laid down in the Maastricht treaty, without any reference to the wishes of the electorate.

Mr. Leighton: I was taken, earlier this evening, to hear my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East chiding the Paymaster General for not making a good enough case. He prompted him, telling him what he should have said, and how he should have put the case. There is a bipartisan coalition between the two Front Benches.

Mr. Winterton: Tripartisan.

Mr. Leighton: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman is right, and we should also include the hon. Members for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) and for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy).

The matter is serious. If we have a single currency, which is the objective of the treaty, we get a single central bank which, we are told, will be independent. That is a nice word, although autonomous would also do. But independent of whom? It will be independent of us, of Parliament, of anybody who has been democratically elected. It will be beyond the reach of the ballot box. The electorates of all the countries of the Community will be stripped of their powers.

I have always understood the historic purpose of the Labour party to be to bring money under democratic control, although some may think that a Utopian idea. That was one reason why Clem Attlee nationalised the Bank of England. He saw what bankers had done in the 1930s and he thought that banking should be brought under democratic control. He must be turning in his grave, given what the party is saying at the moment.

Mr. Budgen: I am sure that I do not need to remind the hon. Gentleman that, on Second Reading of the Bill to nationalise the Bank of England, Robert Boothby voted in favour and a number of Keynesian Tories abstained because they took the view that the bank had been a major cause of the unemployment and depression in the 1930s. They believed that there should be political control of the bank.

Mr. Leighton: That is exactly right. They saw what the bankers had done before the war and people, having fought for six years, were not prepared to accept a world run by bankers. Clem Attlee nationalised the Bank of England, but we shall have to change that and say "Clem, you got it wrong". I am not prepared to do that.

If we pass the Bill, all monetary, exchange rate and budgetary policy—all the bread-and-butter issues of British politics—will be handed to institutions beyond our control. That is the opposite of what the Labour party stands for. In those circumstances, what would be the Labour party's purpose? What could it do? Why should anybody vote for it? We should be preparing ourselves for a fate similar to that of Mitterrand's socialists.

The bank's objectives are laid out in the treaty, but it does not mention unemployment. The only object of the bank—the only aim that overrides and excludes everything else—is price stability. Of course, we want low inflation, but since when has price stability been the sole or even primary aim of the Labour party? If we make price stability our only aim, we betray everything that we stand for. Any fool can reduce inflation by destroying the economy, by inducing recession, by graveyard economics and by creating mass unemployment. That is what the Government have tried to do, but even they have been forced back.

I have a briefing from the Bank of England for November 1992, which says:

> "Had the United Kingdom remained in the ERM it is quite possible that price stability would have been achieved during next year"— that is this year.

> "Although clearly desirable in itself, price stability attained so quickly might have intensified the problems of domestic debt deflation."

The bank is saying that we could have had wonderful price stability, but that the price would have been too high, so we did not go down that road.

Although the bank says that we should not go only for price stability, the Labour party seems to agree that price stability should be the sole aim of policy. In the past, Labour's economic policy has always had four aims: low inflation; a balance of payments equilibrium; economic growth—when we were in the ERM, growth was negative; and high employment. That is what the Labour party has always believed in. It is difficult sometimes to keep all the balls in the air, but throughout the history of the Labour party it has never been our policy to give sole priority to the one aim of price stability, yet that is exactly what the treaty spells out in the clearest possible terms.

We were able to leave the exchange rate mechanism —we got it wrong. We cut interest rates by 4 per cent. and now have a more competitive pound. I understand that that is now leading to an upturn in the economy. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear!"] I hope that those hon. Members who are cheering agree that we should not have gone into it in the first place. Under EMU, we would not have been allowed to come out; we would have been locked in and that would have been that.

With separate currencies, if the economy becomes uncompetitive we get a warning signal—the balance of payments deficit—and we can take remedial action. With a single currency, that is not possible. Instead of a balance of payments deficit, there are blighted areas and unemployment and our people suffer.

What will happen if people who are suffering come to us with their grievances? What will Labour Members be able to say to them? How will we answer them? We will have to say, "We are sorry, but we gave these powers away and we cannot do anything about it." We should have to say that politics cannot be of any help or provide any remedy. I do not know how the Labour party can possibly support that. I only hope that the party that I know will come to its senses at some stage.

Mr. Wilkinson: I enter the debate with some trepidation after two such distinguished speeches as those of the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) and the hon. Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton). Both spoke with tremendous cogency and great intellectual honesty—a quality that has made our debates distinctive, certainly in regard to those who do not support the proposed treaty on European union.

I find it extremely strange that Her Majesty's Government should will the objective of European union —and thereby the mechanistic approach set out in the treaty to achieve it—while not wholly willing the means of stage 3 unless there be first the House's approval by Act of Parliament. This is an inherent inconsistency, which may have been convenient at the time of the general election but which does not bear rational scrutiny now.

The process whereby economic and monetary union is to be achieved is inherently one of convergence. Not just earlier this evening but in previous debates we have heard eloquent descriptions of how damaging that process of convergence has been for our own economy. It has been a shameful process. I simply do not understand how our Government could, with such equanimity, tolerate the wholly unnecessary imposition of the levels of unemployment and misery on our people which characterised the two years preceding our escape from the exchange rate mechanism on 16 September. Anyone with one grain—one iota—of economic nous knew that to perpetuate a regime of high interest rates at a time of world recession was to compound that recession virtually to the point of slump.

Mr. Budgen: Is not my hon. Friend being somewhat unkind to the Government? It might have been reasonable for the Government to say, before 16 September, "There have been only three or four attempts to fix our currency to an exchange rate mechanism: each time it has given rise either to a slump or to some other major economic disaster, but none the less we want to try this experiment once more to see whether, with the finesse for which we are renowned, we can defeat the forces of the markets and the law of averages." That is a perfectly respectable argument. Once we had the good fortune to be thrown out of the ERM on 16 September, what further evidence was necessary to persuade the Government that a fixed exchange rate did not work and that a common currency would not work? The Government say that they need further argument and further persuasion to make up their mind. My hon. Friend is very fair minded. Will he explain what the Government have to make up their mind about?

Mr. Wilkinson: I may have been naive, but I thought that the Government were all too ready to make up their mind on such matters, often flying in the face of the facts. As evidence of that, I adduce the remarks of my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, who in the last debate that we had on EMU told me that the policy of Her Majesty's Government was to rejoin the ERM as soon as the circumstances were right—and he gave the impression that those circumstances would be right in the not too distant future.

When I said that I found it wholly irrational that the Government should embrace the mechanistic approach to EMU contained in the treaty, I did so with good reason. Eschewing independence in monetary policy, losing full control of indirect taxation and taking part in the cohesion fund, which would export jobs from the United Kingdom and create them in our competitor countries in the south of Europe and in Ireland, were in the past—and will be to an even greater extent in the future—manifestly against our national interest. The same would be true of our embracing the treaty's disciplines on budget deficit and Government debt which, certainly in the case of budget deficit for the time being and probably for the foreseeable future, are beyond the wildest dreams of fiscal probity and discipline.

Sir Ivan Lawrence (Burton): Is not my hon. Friend again being too harsh on the Government? Is he not aware that some very strong voices in the Government said that we should not join the ERM because they foresaw the very problems which materialised? However, British industry said that it needed stability and the advantages that it was sure that only the ERM could provide. The members of the Government who had strong doubts about the ERM agreed, saying that if that was what industry wanted, that was what they had better give it. The same voices in industry who spoke of the need to go into the ERM are now speaking of the need to ratify the treaty. Does my hon. Friend agree that they were wrong then and that they are wrong now?

Mr. Wilkinson: There is much in what my hon. and learned Friend says. I merely observe that I was struck by the Chancellor of the Exchequer's remarks in his Budget statement in which he seemed to take a perverse pride in our escape from the ERM on 16 September and virtually to claim that it was Government policy. To be candid, I do not think that the Government have received the condemnation that was rightly due. However, one could perhaps be more charitable and say that the Government held an understandable position and were seeking, once and for all, to stamp out the age old British problem of inflation and to do so by means of the artificial discipline of our membership of the ERM. They almost did so, but, as the hon. Member for Newham, North-East said, the pain was eventually too great and the medicine was on the point of killing the patient.

Mr. Marlow: Has my hon. Friend had an opportunity to read the Daily Mail today? He said that the cohesion fund would take jobs from this country and create them in Italy, Greece and Ireland. If he had read the Daily Mail today, he might ask what evidence there is that the money would produce jobs anywhere and not go into the pockets of the Mafia, corrupt officials and the IRA.

Mr. Wilkinson: The derogation of the sovereignty of our Parliament and of the British nation through its traditional democratic institutions in favour of the centralised institutions of the Community is one of the most pernicious and damning aspects of the proposed treaty on European union. There have been some eloquent descriptions of it, most notably perhaps from Paul Johnson in The Daily Telegraph today. As is so often the case, my hon. Friend gets straight to the point.

Mr. Budgen: As to why the Government cannot make up their minds on monetary union, the Danes have done so and say that they do not want any form of monetary union. Do the Danes have information that is denied to our Government, or is it that our Government intend to slide into monetary union at some future stage and just want to play for time? I cannot believe that that is true.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: My hon. Friend is naive.

Mr. Budgen: I hope that the truth is that the Danes know something that we have not been told.

Mr. Wilkinson: I am worried that the Danes may not adequately know what is known to us and of the admission by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office in Committee last week that the so-called opt-outs or further opt-outs that the Danes obtained at Edinburgh have no legal effect and are not justiciable. In other words, on 18 May the Danish people will be asked essentially the same question that they were asked in the previous referendum. They believe otherwise, but on this serious matter the Danish people are being misled.

We should not be misled. We have no excuse for being misled. Only last week, an eminent body of Eurocrats examining the fault lines in the exchange rate mechanism —with the careful scrutiny that those fault lines, which so suddenly appeared on 16 September, merit—and with the wisdom of hindsight, declared that there was inherently nothing wrong with the ERM process towards economic and monetary union and concluded that, notwithstanding what happened, the Community should press on regardless to the objective of economic and monetary union.

Mr. Salmond: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point about the virtue of floating and competitive exchange rates between countries, but could not the same argument apply equally within member states? Is it not the case that at various times in the fairly recent past areas such as the north of England, Wales and Scotland suffered from an over-valued exchange rate—the national exchange rate of sterling? Can the hon. Gentleman point to any occasion when he expressed in the House the same amount of sympathy for those areas in having to battle against an over-valued exchanged rate, or when he argued for a regional policy designed to combat the consequences and to provide compensation?

Mr. Wilkinson: Yes, I can. Long before the hon. Gentleman entered the House, I was making speeches as the Member of Parliament for Bradford, West in favour of the Industry Act 1972 introduced by my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath). With the benefit of hindsight, I would not make similar arguments today—not because I now represent a London constituency but because I believe that those policies were inherently wrongheaded. I take the hon. Gentleman's remarks with the pinch of salt that they deserve because he and his party sold their souls in earlier Divisions on the Bill, and his arguments do not carry now the weight which they might previously have done.

The loss of control of our economic policy contained in the treaty, notwithstanding the opt-out in clause 2, is such as to cause a fundamental change in the relationship between our people and their Government, as well as between the House and the Government represented in the House, and the institutions of Brussels—so much so that future generations will wonder how it came to be that the generation of 1992 in the House appeared to care so little for their nation's independence, sovereignty and pride. How was it? Were they blind? Were they stupid? Were they misled? Were they ignorant? What was it?

The reason, I believe, lies in the degeneration of our parliamentary processes. We have allowed our Parliament, our House of Commons, to become suborned. It is for this reason that I do not believe that the so-called opt-out in clause 2 is worth the paper on which it is written. If the Bill goes through and the treaty is ratified, I do not think that our people will ever be able to look to the House of Commons as the true custodian of their interests and as the guardian of their liberties.

Our people, if they are denied a referendum, will remember how the Whip was applied, how closures came down in mid-sentence, how closures came down before Front Benchers answered any of the arguments. They will also remember that patronage, intimidation, blackmail and the denial of votes on key amendments may have secured the acquis communautaire but that they will not have secured the proper scrutiny of key legislation for the management of this economy and for the democratic governance of our country. This is why I do not believe that the so-called opt-out from stage 3 counts for very much, unless we change or ways and unless we change our processes.

I shall not vote against the clause. [HON. MEMBERS: "Why not?"] Why should I? I hope for the best, as anybody would. I place my hope in a future Parliament. It is for those who are elected to it to make sure that it does its duty. I hope that it will. I am an optimist. It is not for me to make a judgment. I cannot say that I have great optimism, but I hope most sincerely that on this point I shall be proved wrong.

Mr. Rowlands: The powerful speech of the hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) led to him carrying the Committee, until the last minute of it. I hope that at least he will consider voting against Third Reading, as opposed to clause 2.

Mr. Wilkinson indicated assent.

Mr. Rowlands: The hon. Gentleman made a powerful case for the way in which parliamentary power will be eroded by the Bill and for the way in which economic and democratic choice will be destroyed by it. At the centre of any democracy is political and economic debate. If we accept the principle, philosophy, objective and aim of economic and monetary union, where lies the diversity and plurality of economic choice which is at the heart of any form of democratic decision making and of any democratic process?

I notice that the rubic to the clause is "Economic and monetary union." I have not been sent here by the people of Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney to back economic and monetary union and to back the monetarist policies that go with it which for generations have destroyed jobs in the communities that I represent. Over the years, Members of Parliament have come to this House of Commons from our communities to oppose such policies. I do not see why at this time we should support policies in treaty form which, if accepted and implemented, will be irrevocable for all time.

I was interested in the comparisons that were made. In one sense, the economic history was, I am afraid, slightly wrong. Comparison was made with the 1930s. The interesting point about the 1930s and the reason why we have drawn the wrong conclusion is that, oddly, it was Chamberlain, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, when driven off the gold standard—the 1920s equivalent of the exchange rate mechanism—who devalued the pound which led to a 2 per cent. interest rate and, for most of the country, rapid growth. Unemployment fell after Britain came off the gold standard in 1931 from 3 million to 1·5 million. The tragedy of the 1930s was that that growth and prosperity bypassed huge areas of Britain. The absence of any form of regional policy led to large-scale unemployment in regional terms.

The ironic point is that for most of the 1930s the slump was mild and short-lived for large parts of the country. The chief reason for that was that when in 1931 the Tory National Government were driven off the gold standard —the equivalent of the ERM—they were able to follow a policy of devaluation—like floating exchange rates—and interest rates were 2 per cent. That led to a sustained boom in many parts of the country. Alas, that was not the case for south Wales and for three or four other major areas. That, rather than the lesson that one or two hon. Members have drawn, is the lesson to draw, ironically, from the experience of the 1930s.

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): Will the hon. Gentleman bring matters a little nearer to today and tell us whether he regards the Bretton Woods experience as a disaster?

Mr. Rowlands: The Bretton Woods experience was very different from the one that we are being asked to write into the treaty. It was a completely different set of principles and arrangements.

Mr. Denzil Davies: A different kind.

Mr. Rowlands: It was of a different kind. What we do know is that, when people have tried to fix exchange rates and have then driven monetarist policies to support them, those actions have led to high rates of unemployment, and to slump and depression. For the life of me I cannot see how, as my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) forcefully put it, the Labour party, above all, can be endorsing or supporting such processes.

Mr. Salmond: Does the hon. Gentleman agree with Lady Thatcher that, in terms of exchange rates, one cannot buck the market?

Mr. Rowlands: I rarely agree with anything that Lady Thatcher and Lord Lawson say. However, once or twice they get it right. In the case of fixed exchange rates and the experience of the ERM, those who were critics of that arrangement—a number of hon. Members on both sides were critics—have been proved right. The point was put more than forcefully by my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-East. Why should we listen to those who got it hopelessly wrong in the past 18 months to two years, and why should we believe that they are any more likely to get it right next time?

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): How can the hon. Gentleman possibly compare the 1920s with today? We should remember that today we have automation and mechanisation. We do not see a conductor on a bus. To get out of a station, one puts in a ticket, and to get on to the train one gets a ticket out of a machine. So many jobs have been lost as a result of high technology. We do not have a labour-intensive economy—[Interruption.] My point has everything to do with monetary policy. The hon. Gentleman is trying to compare unemployment in the 1920s with unemployment today. He is simply not comparing like with like.

Mr. Rowlands: I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman was here when references were made to the nature of the depression of the interwar years. I was observing that the reason why unemployment fell after 1931 in many parts of the country but not, sadly, in the part that I represent was that Britain came off the gold standard—the equivalent of coming out of the ERM—in 1931. That was one of the lessons that it was worth while to draw. The other was the need for regional policy, with which Conservative Members still disagree. I do not think that the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) will agree with us on regional policy, although he should because the other lesson to draw from the terrible experiences of the 1930s was the problem caused by the reluctance to apply a regional policy when the general prosperity bypassed whole areas.

When there was a change in the late 1930s as a result of parliamentary and public pressure, and when there was a nascent regional policy, we saw at last the possibility of that policy improving employment problems in areas such as mine. We shall not accept going back to concepts of monetarism and fixed exchange rates, which have destroyed and not enhanced jobs in communities such as mine, both historically and recently.

How are we to believe the assurances that have been given in respect of clause 2? Are we to believe that here are the belt and braces, the buttress, of parliamentary democracy? That is what the Government claimed as they waved their piece of paper—another parallel with the 1930s, saying, "We have secured parliamentary democracy in our time; it is to be found in clause 2". Why should we believe that, given that, in accepting clause 1, we are writing into our domestic legislation here and now, irrespective of what we might do at some future date, a whole series of provisions connected with stage 3?

Let me remind the Committee of what we have written into our domestic legislation by passing that clause. Article 3a(2) states:

"Concurrently with the foregoing, and as provided in this Treaty . . . these activities shall include the irrevocable fixing of exchange rates leading to the introduction of a single currency, the ECU, and the definition and conduct of a single monetary policy and exchange rate policy".

If the Bill is passed, that provision will become part of our domestic legislation, as will articles 104c(1), 105(1) and 109j. We are writing into our domestic legislation here and now a whole series of articles and paragraphs containing provisions for the third stage of monetary union.

Mr. Cash: The hon. Gentleman went through the Lobby with me a little while ago. No doubt he will have noticed that we have this evening voted to ensure that we will not be able to veto the process of any member state —and that includes us—to the third stage by 1 January 1999. Has he also noted the crucial words in clause 2:

"unless a draft of the notification has first been approved by Act of Parliament"?

I hope that hon. Members will note that that in no way says that, when a Bill comes before Parliament at a future date, we will be able to challenge the question and the principle of economic and monetary union. It is merely a device, a con trick and a fraud. The clause does no more than to tell us that the Government will produce the draft of the notification and that the scope of the Bill will be so restricted that we shall be able to do damn all about it.

Mr. Rowlands: I was drawing the Committee's attention to the fact that, if we pass the Bill, we pass into our domestic legislation all the articles of stage 3 of monetary union. I have never understood why—unless it was a piece of political expediency designed to get the treaty through and to get agreement at Maastricht—it was necessary to introduce a Bill to incorporate the whole of the stage 3 legislation now, given that we are supposed to have the chance of opting out of it at some future date. Why in 1993 should we introduce provision after provision and detail after detail enshrining in our domestic legislation monetary union, a single currency, irrevocable exchange rates and all the rest and all the statutes of the European central bank and of the ESCB? If we pass the Bill, every article that is part of stage 3 becomes part of our domestic law.

We are being asked to believe that, at some time in the future, the Government of the day will abort the whole process. Will they suddenly say, "No" when the momentum will have carried into our domestic legislation every provision necessary to implement stage 3? Will they really pull the plug at the last minute?

We must bear in mind that the Government are arguing that they want to be at the heart of Europe. They claim that their European credit and badge of honour lie in passing the Bill and implementing the legislative requirements of the treaty. However, we are led to believe that the Government will not come before the House at some point in the future with a Bill to press the button to implement the stage 3 mechanism. If we buy that one, we are more naive than I thought we were.

12.15 am

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): The hon. Gentleman is making a rhetorical point with great fervour. However, in this Parliament and under this system of Government of which the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues are so proud, there are endless examples of legislation that is not brought into effect when it is passed, and in many cases, as political circumstances change, is not brought into effect at all. Why is this the con trick that the hon. Gentleman makes out it is?

Mr. Rowlands: In the 25 years or more that I have been in this place, I have found that there is an enormous difference between the implementation of a commencement order in domestic legislation and writing into domestic legislation an international treaty, with all its liabilities and obligations. There is a world of difference between those two processes.

It has been said that, because it is unlikely that anyone will be able to sign up to stage 3 for monetary union, we should not worry about it. However, we have been conned in the past. Everyone thought that the Single European Act would simply pave the way for a Common Market and that it was not part of the process towards political and monetary union that we are being asked to approve now. As we have been conned in the past, I am not willing to buy the legislative safeguards and provisions on offer in clause 2.

Mr. Rowe: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way again. The history of the world is littered with treaties that have been abrogated, have fallen into disuse or have been ignored as time progresses and political circumstances change. If the prognosis for the policies enshrined in the Maastricht treaty are half as gloomy as the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues believe, there is no prospect of its coming into serious effect.

Mr. Rowlands: I am not sure of the hon. Gentleman's criteria or standards of integrity, but I will not support a Bill or a treaty if I believe that it does not mean something or that it should not be implemented. I will not support it if I believe that, with a bit of luck, things will change and it will become irrelevant. That is not the way to legislate or to sign treaties.

As I do not agree with the objectives of the treaty or the legislation seeking to implement the treaty, and as I do not believe in the reassurances offered on clause 2, I will oppose the Bill on Third Reading.

Mr. Budgen: The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) doubted whether I would support his arguments about regional policy. However, arguments about regional policy are relevant to the discussion.

When we tell Scotland that it cannot have its own currency or devalue it or float it against the English pound and thereby put itself in a more competitive position in comparison to the English, and as we deprive Scotland of that control over its economy, we must say, "All right—we'll give you some compensation by way of a regional fund." That has a lesson for us as we consider the treaty. It is nonsense for the Government to say, "We are prepared to go into a single currency, but we are not prepared to allow a major extension of the regional and social fund".

Mr. Salmond: The hon. Gentleman, with his usual perception, has put his finger on the important point that regional policy is a compensation for our surrogate devaluation—for not having the ability to have a flexible exchange rate. Would it not be ironic if, in the review of regional policy which is under way at present, the Government were to tilt the balance even further by reorienting that regional policy towards areas which should not be looking for compensation from an overvalued exchange rate? Will the hon. Gentleman give a guarantee that he will oppose that when a measure providing for the concentration of regional policy on the south-west of England comes before the House in the next few months?

Mr. Budgen: As to the areas which require compensation, that depends simply on the question of which area might benefit from having an independent currency. For the sake of argument, it is logical and possible that, if Wales were independent, it might be the area with a strong exchange rate against the pound. Equally, it is possible that the south-east, with a freely floating pound, might be the area with an exchange range which floats downwards and becomes more competitive. I do not agree that the point made by the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) flows inexorably from what I am saying.

It is amazing that the Government say, "We might well go into a single currency, but we are not prepared to see the funds for the regional and social fund grow any more". The weaker economies of Europe, which have been denied the opportunity of pricing themselves into work, will inevitably ask for more money. If our Government are right in saying that the treaty is not a federal structure which will give the other countries some form of joint control over the way in which they regulate their economies and see that money which comes from central and public funds is properly administered, that will inevitably result in a great increase in the waste and fraud which is already a large feature of the life of the EEC. That may be only a small point in the argument about whether we should have a single currency.

The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney reviewed the way in which we have experimented over the past 60 years with various attempts at fixed exchange rates. He referred to the lessons which many people learnt in 1931. I suppose the next catastrophic lesson that was learnt from fixing exchange rates occurred in 1967. This Government learned a terrible lesson on 16 September. One must ask the question: what is the purpose of politics if it is not to give some form of intellectual leadership and choice to the nation?

For the sake of argument, if one goes into a pub and asks someone, "Are you in favour of the council tax?", it would be perfectly reasonable for that person to say, "I really do not know; I cannot tell—I shall have to think about it later." But if one asked the Prime Minister, "Are you in favour of the council tax?", it is not unreasonable for him to have a view about it. It is not unreasonable for him to say, "As a matter of fact, I am in favour of the council tax". Despite the occasional mistakes that we make, I suggest that an advantage of voting Conservative is that one gets the council tax.

Surely it is not a gross impertinence to say that someone who asks for guidance about the advantages of fixed exchange rates over floating exchange rates is entitled to say to the politicians, "Please could you tell me what is your view about this? I understand that there have been experiments about fixed exchange rates for some 62 years and clever people have drawn conflicting conclusions about them. But, o politician, don't we employ you to have a view about this?"

It is extraordinary that the Government's position is, "This is a frightfully difficult problem. We really do not know what our view will be about this. A lot of superior people in Europe are saying that they intend to move to a single currency. It would be grossly impertinent of us to offer a view about it. Could we please move as close as possible to a single currency? Then it is just possible that we may exercise intellectual and political leadership and tell the British people whether in our opinion entering a single currency would be to their advantage."

Mr. Cash: Does my hon. Friend accept that a book was written once upon a time on a theme similar to the one that my hon. Friend is developing? It was by a certain Samuel Smiles, who wrote about Mr. Nobody. Samuel Smiles' point of criticism was that this extraordinary person continually passed the buck because he could not make up his mind what policy he should pursue. As a result, he fell eventually into the trap of developing such a fit of political defeatism that government simply disintegrated. Does my hon. Friend agree that that could be the path on which we are now embarked?

Mr. Budgen: I find it all very difficult. We have a truly remarkable political debate in Britain. The two Front-Bench teams broadly agree that our economy should be run in subordination to the European Community. Yet marginal changes in taxation give rise to enormous certainties and a vast amount of inter-party abuse.

Mr. Marlow: Going back to where my hon. Friend was a few moments ago, I think that he has missed the point, wittily though he has put it. When one says to the Prime Minister, "Are you in favour of a fixed exchange rate or not?", the answer will not be whether he is in favour of it or not, but whether it brings us closer to the heart of Europe or not. It is not about the fixed exchange rate. Everything is related to how close it brings us to the heart of Europe.

Mr. Budgen: That may be so, but as I understand it —I may be wrong—the Danes have said that they do not want a single currency at any price. It may be that the Danes have been conned. Everyone knows how clever everyone in Europe is. The Danes have been brave enough to make it an issue of principle and to say that they do not want a single currency.

Mr. Spearing: The hon. Gentleman has mentioned two matters for which there is surely a sensible and understandable explanation. The first is the alleged difference between stages 2 and 3, which the Prime Minister suggests is a great victory for choice. Could not the two Front-Bench teams and the Cabinet be accused by the man in the street of political and constitutional fraud? Secondly, as the Minister of State, the right hon. Member for Watford (Mr. Garel-Jones), has made plain at the Dispatch Box and in written answers, there is no change in Denmark's obligations under the treaty. Nothing has been changed by the so-called decision that the Prime Minister brought back from Edinburgh. He came back waving a second piece of paper, pretending that it changed something.

Mr. Budgen: The hon. Gentleman may be right to say that the Danes have been conned. That is the opinion of many of our academic and practising lawyers, such as Martin Howe. [Interruption.] He comes from a distinguished family who have a great deal of knowledge of the workings of the Community. Given that Martin Howe's uncle, as Attorney-General, was responsible for dealing with the European Communities Act 1972 and that we, as Tories, believe in inherited ability, we should be inclined to be respectful of that man's views. The man in the pub would say that Martin Howe says that the Danes are being conned. He is a high-class lawyer, however, and he would not put it in such crude terms, but he may or may not be right.

Mr. Dickens: I do not know whether my hon. Friend was in the Chamber when the right hon. Member for Stepney and Bethnal Green (Mr. Shore) made a thoughtful contribution. He spoke about the grave and great difficulties for all the European currencies in achieving convergence so that they could proceed to a single currency. He said that new members of the Common Market complicated the formula.

I believe that those convergence difficulties mean that there is not a snowball's chance in hell of a single currency. If we were to vote clause 2 down, we would be making a decision to opt out from the treaty now rather than opting out at the time when we come to consider convergence. If one signs a treaty, it is common sense to stick with it until its proposals are up for consideration. Until then, one has taken a decision.

Mr. Budgen: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for the earlier part of his intervention, because he said—I hope that I have got it right—that the proposals for convergence could never be met and that if we attempted to do so it would gravely damage the British economy. He said that that disadvantage was so plain that the Prime Minister should explain to the British people that it could never be to their advantage to opt for a single currency.

There are various certainties in British politics. It is a matter of passionate and clear certainty that if one wants to raise a bit more tax, it is obvious that it should be done by raising value added tax on fuel. That, I understand, is the Tory party's position. That is a matter of certainty and principle which can be easily fought on. It is equally obvious that, for the Labour party, if one wants to raise a bit of extra taxation, it is better done by raising income tax. If such certainties can be expressed about marginal preferences as to whether one should get a bit of extra taxation from one group or another—I would have thought that that was not capable of quite such certainty and must be a matter of marginal preference for each party—surely it is the role of politicians to offer some leadership and some guidance on great issues such as whether we should have a single currency.

Whether we should have followed a policy of rearmament before the last war was another great issue. I do not remember politicians saying to the nation, "Well, we are not terribly sure about this. This is a very, very difficult subject."

Mr. Giles Radice (Durham, North): That is precisely what they said.

Mr. Budgen: Not all of them. The history books tell us that some of them suggested that rearmament was necessary. Some of them suggested that the balance of argument was plain and that we should do something about the problem. Some of them thought that political leadership was about doing the best that one could in evaluating the evidence, then offering some leadership.

As we have been experimenting with fixed exchange rate mechanisms for 62 years, I should not have thought that it would be asking the politicians too much to offer the nation some guidance and leadership. However, if the Tory party leadership is not prepared to offer that guidance and leadership, it inevitably leads one to the conclusion that perhaps it wants to enter the fixed exchange rate mechanism and, following that, a single currency. Otherwise, why should not the leadership offer the guidance?

Mr. Cash: Does my hon. Friend accept that one of the arguments continuously advanced in Government circles is that the whole process is unworkable? Therefore, the Government's way out is to tell us to go along with a modest treaty which does not add up to a row of beans. They forget that it takes 12 member states unanimously to ratify the treaty, and as six of them have their noses firmly in the subsidy trough, the unanimity to unravel the treaty afterwards will not exist. Does my hon. Friend agree that there is an element of deception in the way the argument is being advanced?

Mr. Budgen: I do not understand the Government's position. We understand, and have always been told, that we have a politically adroit Conservative Government who are superb at wrong-footing the Labour party. The Labour party has stood on its head 100 times and has finally reached the position where it is in favour of obtaining a single currency as soon as possible. It can now be portrayed as the great internationalist and European party.

The Whips sidle up to us saying, "Old boy, this will never come about; show some political sophistication and vote for a bit of nonsense as it will never come about; don't be so awkward and silly—for heaven's sake, learn a bit of political skill or you will never survive." I should have thought that such an adroit Government would appreciate that if the treaty was always going to be nonsense and never come about, there was no better way to make the Labour party unpopular than to play the patriotic card and say that the Labour party was now in the hands of the European enthusiasts while the Conservatives should say that theirs was a British policy, based on sound assessment of what was economically possible.

I find the position difficult to understand. I should have thought that if the Whips were right in saying that the treaty was nonsense, it was a good opportunity for the Government to say clearly that they would not have a single currency at any price at any time. They should say, "We understand the arguments; we made a terrible mistake which left us in an appallingly humiliating position on 16 September, but at least we have learnt from it." If they cannot say that, are we not left with the awful suspicion that they want to return to the ERM and a single currency as quickly as possible? And are we not left in the awful position in which the mistakes of 16 September will be repeated with horrifying consequences for the British people?

Mr. Timothy Kirkhope (Lords Commissioner to the Treasury) rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Question put, That the Question be now put:—

The Committee proceeded to a Division—

Mr. Spearing (seated and covered): On a point of order, Mr. Lofthouse. I do not like this headgear—it does not suit me—but I have no choice but to wear it. I believe that I am correct in saying that the spokesman for Her Majesty's Opposition did not contribute to the last debate.

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): That is correct.

Mr. Spearing: Is it in order, Mr. Lofthouse, for a closure motion to be accepted when an important financial matter has not been spoken to by the Opposition spokesman—or did he not wish to speak?

The Chairman: It was certainly in order. I do not call Members who do not rise to speak.

Mr. Spearing: Thank you, Sir.

The Committee having divided: Ayes 284, Noes 248.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Clause 2, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Spearing: On a point of order, Mr. Lofthouse. You will recall that, during the previous Division, I raised a point of order about the closure motion and the conduct of the Opposition Front Bench spokesman. I pointed out that there had been no speech from a member of the Opposition Front Bench. I inquired about the propriety of accepting a closure motion in those circumstances. You informed me that, to your knowledge or to your sight, no member of the Opposition Front Bench rose to speak. As a result, I had a few words with my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith)——

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. I have already ruled on that point of order, and I have nothing further to add.

I must tell the Committee that, after the debate on clause 3 stand part, I am prepared to select for separate Divisions new clauses 1 and 2, tabled in the name of the Leader of the Opposition.

Clause 3 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Annual Report by Bank of England

' .—In implementing Article 108 of Title II of the Treaty on European Union, and ensuring compatibility of the statutes of the national central bank, Her Majesty's Government shall, by order, make provision for the Governor of the Bank of England to make an annual report to Parliament, which shall be subject to approval by a Resolution of the Commons House of Parliament.'.—[Mr. Andrew Smith.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New clause 2

Information from Commission

'In implementing the provisions of Article 103(3) of Title II of the Treaty on European Union, information shall be submitted to the Commission from the United Kingdom indicating performance on economic growth, industrial investment, employment and balance of trade, together with comparisons with those items of performance from other member states.'.—[Mr. George Robertson.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

The First Deputy Chairman: I am prepared to allow after a debate on new clause 8 separate Divisions on new clauses 10 and 12, both in the name of the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore).

New clause 8

Entry into force

'This Act shall come into force on a day appointed by the Secretary of State by order in a statutory instrument.'.—[Mr. Shore.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Motion made and Question proposed, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Dorrell: On a point of order, Mr. Lofthouse. The name of the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) does not appear among those shown in the amendment paper against new clause 8.

The First Deputy Chairman: I advise the Committee that any right hon. or hon. Member can move the motion.

To report progress and ask leave to sit again.—[Mr. MacKay.]

Committee report progress; to sit again this day.

Helicopter Safety (North Sea)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. MacKay.]

1.13 am

Mr. George Robertson (Hamilton): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Can you help the House? I know that you have resumed the Chair and that that causes certain problems when describing what occurred when the House was sitting as a Committee of the whole House, but would it be possible for you to explain the slight confusion at the end of the Committee's proceedings? Can I take it that the moving of new clause 8 will occur at the beginning of the next sitting of the Committee and that the motion to report progress took place prior to any——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. New clause 8 has been moved, but it can be debated at the next sitting.

1.14 am

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): This debate arises directly out of the determination by Sheriff Alexander Jessop following the fatal accident inquiry into the deaths of 11 men in the North sea, after the tragic failure of a brief flight between the Cormorant Alpha platform and the accompanying safe supporter on 14 March last year. I wish to pay tribute to Sheriff Jessop for the depth and clarity of his report. I also want to place on record the sympathy of this House to the bereaved of that accident, which reminded us again of the high cost of North sea oil and gas, in terms of human life.

I do not have time to analyse in detail Sheriff Jessop's findings, and indeed I do not want to confine this debate to the specific circumstances of Cormorant Alpha. One of Sheriff Jessop's observations was:

"each and every witness was anxious to ensure that as much as possible could be learned from this tragic accident to ensure that future deaths might be prevented."

It is in that broader spirit that I approach tonight's debate, and raise relevant questions.

Central to what I am asking the Minister to respond to is a concern about the means which at present exist for enforcing and regulating helicopter safety in the North sea. Sheriff Jessop has asked the Civil Aviation Authority to carry out a wide-ranging review of helicopter safety. This is undoubtedly overdue. As things stand, the CAA is the appropriate body for him to call upon.

However, I am bound to express my own view, which is also the long-standing position of the Labour party, that we need an independent safety body, the sole concern of which is safety in all its forms. It should not be an agency with other governmental responsibilities. The nearest parallel which I can draw is with the National Transportation Safety Board in the United States. This is the kind of body which should now have—and, indeed, years ago should have had—overall responsibility for helicopter safety in the North sea, and much else besides.

I believe the record of the Civil Aviation Authority in these matters must be subjected to scrutiny. Sheriff Jessop commented upon their "reactive" role. Many who work in the North sea believe that even this term does not adequately reflect the CAA's reluctance to take a lead. The point was made to me that Shell had at least taken the initiative in introducing its own adverse weather regime as a form of self-regulation. It deserves credit for doing so, albeit after the Cormorant Alpha tragedy had occurred. No other oil company has yet followed suit, which is regrettable. But the even more serious point is that the Civil Aviation Authority has not obliged any oil company, including Shell, to introduce these precautions. Surely it should not be down to individual oil, or helicopter, companies to decide on such a fundamental safety issue. The regulations should come through the regulatory body, and at present that means the CAA.

Sheriff Jessop has asked the CAA itself to review the adverse weather issue, and a list of others. But the point has been made to me that this is a case of asking the poacher to investigate the poacher, because many of the worries about helicopter safety in the North sea stem directly from the perception that the CAA has been, at best, "reactive" and, at worst, inactive over a long period. Nobody questions its integrity or professional competence, but it does work under pressure as an agency of Government to take account of factors other than safety.

As for adverse weather, the contradiction is that the helicopters are designed to withstand conditions in which the safety apparatus may not function. Shell has now acknowledged that fast dinghies, which may be the only realistic means of effecting a rescue, may not be launched from safety vessels in conditions which give rise to waves of over 5·5 m. That is in line with the CAA specifications for these small craft.

However, the Super Puma helicopter, for instance, is thought to be able to float in 30-ft waves. There may be limited point in that admirable characteristic if nobody can get launched to rescue the people who are on board, because of the same fierce weather conditions.

Does it not make sense to bring these factors into line? It is not, in such circumstances, the performance of the helicopter which matters more but the performance of the means of rescue. If these means do not exist, then should the helicopter be flying?

The CAA knows that helicopters are less safe than fixed-wing aircraft. As one helicopter pilot said to me, the CAA dresses people up as if they were going to the moon to travel on board one. In spite of the recognition that there is a higher risk of men ending up in the sea, the CAA does not seek to guarantee, in so far as anything can be guaranteed, an environment in which that eventuality is survivable.

That is the key paradox. Quite simply, one should not have helicopters flying over 50-ft waves unless some realistic assurance exists that there will be means of survival if the helicopter ends up in the sea. At present, the safety regime seems to rely on the statistical probability that the helicopter will not ditch and that if it does, it will not be one of those nasty days. Sadly, reality does not always match statistical probability.

I shall touch quickly on some other points. It is clear that pilot fatigue can be a factor in helicopter accidents. The logic of that reality is surely that, in the interests of safety, we should be moving towards shorter flying hours for pilots, or at least retaining the status quo. The present flight time and duty hour limitations were introduced only in 1990, specifically in response to the concerns of aero-medical examiners serving the Aberdeen area about the high incidence of fatigue among helicopter pilots. Now it seems that the process is to be reversed.

The newly issued EC proposals for limitations, to take effect in 1995, represent a considerable liberalising of the position and are causing great concern in the industry.

They were drawn up, incidentally, with the involvement of non-EC countries where existing standards may be less rigid, which seems a little odd.

Under those proposals, there are no controls to prevent duty hours from being acquired in a short period. Some activities, such as standby at the place of work, may not count as duty. There are reduced provisions for rest days. In short, the British Air Line Pilots Association—BALPA—believes that the net effect of the current proposals could be a cumulative increase in flying hours of almost 40 per cent. over the maximum currently permitted in the United Kingdom over a three-day period. That, quite simply, is unacceptable, and must not be accepted by the Department of Transport.

I turn briefly to the carriage of safety equipment, which takes me back to the question of who should exercise a regulatory role. The question whether survival craft are best carried inside or outside the helicopter strikes me as fundamental. In all the years that helicopters have been operating in the North sea, one would have thought that an informed decision might have been made on which solution offers the better prospect of survival. One would then expect the CAA to regulate accordingly.

Not so. This, like so much else, is still a matter for the individual operator. Putting the craft outside the helicopter costs more money. Some operators, notably British International Helicopters, accept that commitment; others do not. In my view, it should be a matter not of choice but of regulation.

I shall say a word about search and rescue helicopters from mainland bases. My hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, West (Mr. Ross) wants to pursue the point with the leave of the House and with the agreement of the Minister. I asked a number of people involved in the North sea what they thought about recent cuts. In each case, they thought them regrettable and potentially dangerous. "We certainly didn't want to lose Leuchars," one pilot said to me. Frankly, if they—along with many others—did not want to lose Leuchars, they should not have lost it, and that cover should be restored.

I have one final point, which is not directly for the Minister, but which I hope he will draw to the attention of a colleague. Sheriff Jessop, having presided over this harrowing inquiry, specifically recommended that witnesses in such inquiries should have access to legal aid. I hope that his authoritative view will be accepted.

I am grateful to have had the opportunity to raise these important matters, and I am grateful to the Minister for being here at this time, and, because of the circumstances in which the debate was obtained, at slightly shorter notice than usual. As the tragedy of Cormorant Alpha demonstrated, like many tragedies before it, we are talking literally of matters of life and death. We owe the people working in the North sea a great deal. Indeed, we owe them nothing but the best, and that means nothing but the safest.

Mr. Ernie Ross (Dundee, West): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) and the Minister for allowing me a couple of minutes to speak on this issue. It is not just the fact that many hon. Members, if they had been aware that this debate was taking place, would have wanted to say something about the withdrawal of the search and rescue facilities, especially at Leuchars, which is not in my constituency, but in the constituency of the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) who, I am sure, would have wished to have made some comment.

The matter is of concern to those of us on the east coast of Scotland, not only because of the facility that was available to those who wanted to go climbing in and around Tayside but because of the part that it played in the many incidents that unfortunately occur offshore in the various east Neuk holiday resorts and in holiday resorts off the east coast of Scotland. Had the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East been here, he would have been able to put the case for the retention of that search and rescue facility more strongly than I can.

I am also concerned about the movement of search and rescue helicopters down the whole of the east coast. Some of the changes that are taking place—particularly the movement of the SAR helicopters from Coltishall to Wattisham—have put some grass platforms in the southern sector at least 20 more minutes beyond the limit that is normally acceptable, and that is bound to give us cause for concern.

Let me return to the Cormorant Alpha accident. As my hon. Friend explained, the concern over safety is that there is a gap between the regulatory responsibilities of the Health and Safety Executive and the Civil Aviation Authority. Similarly, as regards the decision whether to fly, there is a gap in responsibility between the offshore installation manager, who is responsible for everything on the installation, and the pilot, who is responsible for the helicopter and the passengers.

We know from anecdotal evidence that many of the unions, including my union, MSF, have gathered a great deal of evidence to suggest that, in the North sea, pilots are under pressure to fly in conditions that are bad enough to justify a decision not to fly. An unco-operative pilot could lose his employer the next contract.

Because the CAA says that the pilot is responsible, those commercial pressures are never revealed. If the pilot admitted that he had flown when he thought that the conditions were not correct, he could end up losing his licence, and that could lead to his dismissal. If he does not respond to the pressures put on him by his employer, his employer could lose the contract.

Even if the employer supported the pilot when he said that he believed that the conditions were not right for him to fly, there is the possibility that, when the contract review came along, the employer could lose. All those areas of concern needed to be answered by the Minister—if not tonight, on a later occasion.

We have plenty of hard evidence, which will be going to tribunals in the near future, to suggest that oil companies often tell the contractor who to keep and who to make redundant: often, the oil companies themselves do not deny it. Again, the pressure is on the pilots.

As my hon. Friend said, we are also worried that, given the conditions on arrival at the scene, an arrival time of two hours for night flights is not adequate. There is no way that many of those involved in incidents can survive during the period that it takes the helicopter to reach the scene.

The Norwegians base an SAR machine offshore to provide better cover. I hope that the Minister will be able to say what steps have been taken to base search and rescue helicopters offshore to take account of that concern. We are concerned that some of the changes that the Ministry of Defence has made were on safety itself, and I hope that the Minister will be able to return to that matter at a later time.

[Mr. Ernie Ross]

One other element involved in the Cormorant accident was the use of cordless headsets in the helicopters. There has been some debate about whether the cordless headset is viable or makes sense. There is evidence that, unfortunately, during the Cormorant Alpha accident, someone was trapped when the cord was wrapped around his neck. There are clear signs that, in many cases, companies are resisting a move towards cordless headsets, simply because of finance. I hope that the Minister will say that the Government support the use of cordless headsets in helicopters, and that pressure will be placed on companies to introduce them as quickly as possible.

1.29 am

The Minister for Transport in London (Mr. Steve Norris): I congratulate the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) on securing this Adjournment debate on an important issue that affects the safety of thousands of workers in the often hostile environment of the North sea. It is useful for the House to have this opportunity to consider the matter, and the debate is also timely, as the hon. Gentleman said, given the recent publication of the sheriff's report in Aberdeen about the accident near the Cormorant Alpha platform last March. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will allow me to join him in expressing our sympathy to those who were bereaved in the accident, and to pay tribute to the work of Sheriff Jessop, who has produced a comprehensive and useful report.

I must tell the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North and the hon. Member for Dundee, West (Mr. Ross), whose interest in the matter is consistent, that I may not be able to answer all the technical points that have been raised, but I undertake to study the record and to respond to any of the points that I cannot answer this evening.

With regard to cordless headsets, I recall the evidence given to the sheriff about the sad circumstances of one of the fatalities, which appeared to show that the person concerned was unable to extricate himself from the head cord. However, I am unsure whether that is a situation that demands a position from the Government. If it is, it is one of the matters to which I hope to return.

North sea oil and gas are of vital importance to the economy, but we must ensure that safety is always the first priority in aviation or any other activity. In the United Kingdom, the regulation of civil aviation safety is a matter for the Civil Aviation Authority. The letter from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to Christopher Chataway setting out the CAA's objectives makes it very clear that safety is the responsibility of the CAA, and that the Government do not intend to interfere in the discharge of those duties.

Aircraft accidents in the United Kingdom are investigated by the air accidents investigation branch of the Department of Transport. That organisation is deliberately separate from the CAA, so that the regulators are not put in the position of having to judge the effectiveness of their rules and regulations. As the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North said, that would be a bit like asking poachers to judge other poachers.

The AAIB is very widely respected in the aviation community—for instance, its painstaking reconstruction and report of the Lockerbie disaster has drawn worldwide acclaim. The branch is, of course, preparing a very detailed report on the accident at Cormorant Alpha, and this will be published at the end of May. It would not be right for me to prejudge that report.

However, I can assure the House that the CAA will study the AAIB's report very carefully when it is published, as it does in all such cases. It will be for it, using its professional expertise, to decide on action to be taken in response to the safety recommendations in the report. I understand that the CAA is also studying the report on Sheriff Jessop's fatal accident inquiry. There is already a significant programme of work aimed at improving helicopter safety and I shall return to that shortly.

The principal use of helicopters in the United Kingdom for passenger and cargo transport is in the North sea, where, as was said, the extreme environmental hazards are well known. Some eight different types of multi-engined aircraft are used, more than half being the largest types, the Super Pumas and S-61s, each carrying up to 19 passengers. In 1992, the United Kingdom offshore helicopter operations involved some 256,000 flights by 122 helicopters, carrying nearly 2 million passengers.

Even those large figures show a reduction on recent years—in 1991, 137 aircraft on 323,000 flights carried nearly 2·4 million passengers. I give the House those figures simply to put the safety record into perspective vis-a-vis the great number of uneventful helicopter operations.

In the 12 years 1981 to 1992 inclusive, there have been six fatal helicopter crashes offshore, 72 passenger fatalities and the death of 10 crew, of whom more than half were lost in the 1986 accident, when 43 passengers and a pilot died in the Boeing Chinook near Sumburgh in Shetland. That sort of helicopter is no longer used. Sadly and unusually, there were two unprecedented accidents in 1992, in each of which a deck worker was killed by a helicopter rotor.

I must stress that we are looking at the statistics of rare events—six fatal accidents in more than 3 million flights—and one accident can have a marked influence on the apparent trends. If one takes a five-year moving average, the number of fatal accidents per million hours flown declined from more than five to less than two through the 1980s. However, one accident in 1990 and the one in 1992 have pushed the average back up to 3·5. The CAA and the industry know that continued efforts are needed to maintain an improvement in that record.

Mr. Ernie Ross: The statistical evidence which the Minister is producing would not normally be challenged. However, in the North sea, we are moving to not normally manned platforms, which will mean about 20,000 to 30,000 extra flying hours per employee, and, unfortunately, such incidents are more likely to occur. Although the statistics were relevant before, they will not be relevant once we move more towards not normally manned installations.

Mr. Norris: That is a fair point to make. I do not want to overdo the point on which I have been elaborating. It is merely to set the incidence of accidents in the context of a busy theatre of activity in which literally millions of passengers are being transported. It is always a difficult thing to do, but in the short time available I am trying to place in context the sort of accident rate that we have had, wherein, for example, a single accident had a significant effect on the statistical averages because of the number of fatalities that have occurred over 12 years.

The oil industry, under the aegis of the United Kingdom Offshore Operators Association, has set up a helicopter safety steering group. The aim of that group is to co-ordinate progress towards improved helicopter safety. The CAA, the three principal helicopter operating companies—Bristow, Bond and British International Helicopters—and the British Helicopter Advisory Board, chaired by Lord Glenarthur, are represented on the group. Subjects already under study include improvements to lifejackets and the automatic inflation of emergency floats.

It is worth repeating that helicopter operations in the North sea take place in a wide range of weather conditions, but not beyond those approved by CAA in terms of the capability of aircraft and crew. Nonetheless, it is often a hostile environment. The oil companies generally have a wind-speed limit for working on helidecks, and require their employees to wear survival suits when flying. They also give their employees training in emergency procedures. The hon. Gentleman raised the question whether all companies in the North sea should operate adverse weather policies. Clearly, that is an important question.

In his report of the fatal accident inquiry into the Cormorant Alpha crash, the sheriff recommended that every operator and installation in the North sea should take into account the effect of adverse weather on the availability of rescue resources. The Health and Safety Executive is considering that matter in the context of planned new regulations on emergency response, on which it intends to issue a consultative document in the summer.

The new offshore safety case regulations, which come into force this year, require a demonstration that foreseeable risks to persons from a major accident have been fully assessed and measures in place to reduce risks to as low as is reasonably practicable. In that context, it would effectively impose what amounts to an adverse weather policy requirement on operators in the North sea under the new safety case regulations.

The hon. Member for Dundee, West referred to the adequacy of search and rescue facilities. During this debate, I do not want to go into the whole question of the deployment of individual helicopters. I hope that he will allow me to get back to him on that. Suffice it to say that we have search and rescue facilities in the United Kingdom which are the envy of most other countries.

Aeronautical search and rescue is co-ordinated by the rescue and co-ordination centres of the RAF. The centres can call on RAF, Royal Navy and coastguard helicopters as well as other ships and aircraft. In addition, Shell provides a helicopter station in the east Shetland basin which is available to assist with SAR. Helicopters are sometimes called up to operate SAR missions in sea states too hazardous for small surface vessels.

We should not overlook the fact that our neighbours in Norway and Denmark also have helicopter operations in the North sea, albeit on a smaller scale. It is heartening to observe that, in an emergency, the helicopters of each country can be used to help the others. Sadly, the hazards are common. The Norwegians suffered a fatal accident in 1991, with the loss of three lives.

On the matter of principles, it is worth noting that the rotary wing of the helicopter gives it well-known capabilities and manoeuvrability, which make it so important for oil industry support. However, the rotary wing and the machinery which drives and controls it make the helicopter a complex vehicle. That complexity and the uses to which the helicopter is put have made it difficult to achieve accident rates similar to comparable turbo-prop fixed-wing aeroplanes. However, it is the aim of the CAA to achieve comparable accident rates.

Mr. Wilson: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Norris: I have only four minutes, but I give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Wilson: I realise that the Minister has only four minutes, but will he comment on pilots' hours? If he cannot respond in detail and give me the Government's view tonight, perhaps he will undertake to write to me.

Mr. Norris: I did not intend to elaborate on the subject of pilots' hours. However, the hon. Gentleman referred to it in his speech and I shall write to him specifically on it.

In the early 1980s, the CAA and the oil industry established the helicopter airworthiness review panel, which reported in 1984 with some 15 detailed recommendations. In response to the HARP recommendations, a comprehensive programme of research was defined. The cost was borne jointly by CAA, the Departments of Transport and Energy and the oil industry—the UK Offshore Operators Association. Some £1·6 million was spent in the period 1987 to 1990.

A follow-on programme costing £1·7 million is currently in progress, with the Health and Safety Executive now contributing to it. It is a tribute to all involved that the fruits of this work will soon come into service in the form of systems to monitor the technical condition of the helicopter and to provide pilots and engineers with timely warnings.

In addition to making technical improvements to helicopers, the programme includes such items as the development of visual approach guidance lights, improved helideck markings and friction surfaces.

The Health and Safety Executive has responsibility for all aspects of safety on offshore installations, whereas the CAA is responsible for flight safety. The HSE has contracted the CAA to assist with a major inspection programme of helidecks, concentrating initially on the more difficult cases. The work is now in its second year; some 95 decks have been inspected so far, with a further 60 in the current phase. The remaining, less restricted, decks will be considered later. In addition to this, the national air traffic services have worked closely with the industry to improve radio communications and radar cover for North sea operations.

The safety of helicopter operations in the North sea is generally good, considering the environmental conditions experienced. However, there is no room for complacency and the reports from the sheriff of Grampian, Highlands and Islands and the air accident investigation branch will be carefully considered.

[Mr. Norris]

There are naturally calls for a review of North sea helicopter safety. As I have told the House, much work is in hand, and I would be cautious about diverting expert staff from the established programme, or of duplicating effort. It is, however, a most important subject, and I am glad that we have had the opportunity to debate it. I reiterate that I undertake to cover in writing any items which hon. Members raised which I have not covered in my speech.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

DEFENCE

Yugoslavia

1. Mr. Churchill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has for strengthening the British military contigent in former Yugoslavia.

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Malcolm Rifkind): The size and composition of the British contribution to United Nations deployments to the former Yugoslavia are kept under continuous review. I am at present satisfied that the 2,300-strong British contingent serving in Bosnia is of the right size and properly equipped for the important humanitarian tasks assigned to it. We are, however, discussing with the United Nations the future of the British Field Ambulance unit deployed in Croatia since last May, because we are concerned about whether its capacity is being fully utilised.

Mr. Churchill: Will my right hon. and learned Friend convey to the Cheshires and all the other British military units in Bosnia the warmest congratulations of all quarters of the House on the superb job that they have done in the winter months this year in bringing humanitarian aid and relief supplies to the hard-pressed population of Bosnia?

Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that sanctions alone would never have got Saddam Hussein out of Kuwait and sanctions alone will not bring the Serbs to heel on this issue? I hope that my right hon. and learned Friend will in no way consider the involvement of ground forces in a Balkan civil war, but will he, none the less, together with his colleagues, not rule out the possibility of air strikes as recommended by Lord Owen?

Mr. Rifkind: I thank my hon. Friend for his earlier remarks. He chose to make a comparison with the situation in Iraq, but I am sure that he would be the first to recollect that the massive aerial bombardment of Saddam Hussein's troops in Kuwait did not lead to their departure from Kuwait, and that it was the use of ground forces on a massive scale, which my hon. Friend is ruling out in the case of Bosnia, that was required to expel Iraqi forces. Therefore, my hon. Friend must consider the implications of the Iraqi example that he has chosen to put before the House.

Mr. John D. Taylor: Will the Secretary of State assure the House that if United Kingdom air or naval forces take sides in the fighting in Bosnia, by a form of aggression against some of the participants in the terrible fighting that is taking place there, the United Kingdom land forces will be withdrawn immediately from Bosnia?

Mr. Rifkind: We attach the highest priority to the safety and security of British forces, and it is clear that, even in their current humanitarian role, they suffer exposure to some considerable risk. For example, today a British helicopter in the Vitez area may have been hit by some sniper fire. Fortunately, there appear not to have been any consequences from that incident. But if United Nations forces were to be used in a combatant role, clearly the risks to British forces would be immeasurably higher.

Dr. Goodson-Wickes: Having been one of those with initial reservations about the deployment of British troops in Bosnia at all, I have reluctantly come to the conclusion that diplomacy, backed by embargoes and sanctions against some and sustenance for others, is no longer adequate. Given our leadership of the Rapid Reaction Corps, Britain is uniquely well placed to give moral and military leadership in this tragic situation. Will my right hon. and learned Friend urge NATO to deploy elements of that corps so that British troops can work alongside our European allies without our bearing a disproportionate amount of the financial and human costs?

Mr. Rifkind: If my hon. Friend is envisaging what role might be played by the United Nations in the event of a ceasefire, clearly a contribution could be made by the Rapid Reaction Corps in helping to provide the necessary infrastructure of a United Nations operation. It is in that context that the possibility to which my hon. Friend has referred would be most relevant.

Mr. McWilliam: Does the Secretary of State accept that, if air strikes to interdict Serbian supply lines were introduced, the rules of engagement for our forces presently stationed in Bosnia, particularly at Vitez, would have to be changed, because our forces would have to go into the mountains to take the Serb guns—otherwise, they would be blown to pieces?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman makes an important point. An additional consideration must be taken into account by those who advocate the use of armed force by the United Nations. As we have seen in the last couple of days, there is a substantial increase in the conflict between Croat and Muslim forces—particularly in the Vitez area, where the British forces are concentrated. It is incredibly difficult to imagine a scenario in which the United Nations is required to use military force against some combatants but not others, when the bloodshed, loss of life and possibly even the atrocities committed can be found to be the responsibility of the different communities in Bosnia at present.

Mr. Viggers: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that it is completely unrealistic to imagine that a externally imposed military solution will be found? If there were to be increased military pressure—whatever the merits of that—from Britain, the United Nations or NATO, would that not be inconsistent with the widely praised humanitarian aid?

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend makes a powerful point. The Government's extreme reservations about the use of military power in a combat role are partly because we have the gravest doubts that it would have the practical effect recommended for it by its adherents. We are substantially influenced also by the almost certain consequences for the humanitarian operations, which have been a great success and led to the saving of literally hundreds of thousands of lives in Bosnia over the last few months. That work would almost certainly have to be terminated, which would be a heavy price to pay. That aspect should influence the proper moral debate about the proper policy to pursue in Bosnia.

Dr. David Clark: When a ceasefire is finally signed and the United Nations calls on countries to provide troops to enforce it, will Britain play her full part in maintaining that ceasefire? Is the Secretary of State confident that we have sufficient troops, and sufficient helicopters in particular, to play our full part?

Mr. Rifkind: If a ceasefire were signed by the three parties to the dispute, and we were satisfied that that represented a genuine qualitative change in the situation, of course there would be an obligation on the international community, through the United Nations, to do what it could to make the ceasefire a continuing reality and to achieve a permanent peace. The United Kingdom will of course want to ascertain its contribution in those circumstances, in the way suggested. I am satisfied that we could make a significant and substantial contribution, if we chose to do so.

Training Areas (Public Access)

2. Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he plans to take to improve public access to his Department's training areas.

The Minister of State for the Armed Forces (Mr. Archie Hamilton): Ministry of Defence training land is required primarily for military purposes. So far as it is consistent with operational, safety and security considerations and the interests of our tenants, however, we continue to encourage public access and seek actively to improve access arrangements, providing additional facilities and information wherever there is opportunity to do so.

Mr. Bowis: Does my right hon. Friend accept that the British people have lost access through closures? Closures made this century in particular have been the result of land taken, rightly, for defence training purposes. Will my right hon. Friend keep a vigorous watch on such land, to ascertain how quickly it can be restored to the public—and meanwhile ensure that access can be enabled according to the needs of British defence interests?

Mr. Hamilton: I assure my hon. Friend that we keep that aspect constantly under review. I recommend to him the pamphlet, "Walks on Ministry of Defence land"—[Laughter.] I assure Opposition Members who are laughing that a copy is also in the Library. It points out the excellent walks the public can enjoy across training areas.

Mr. Cohen: Will the Minister consider the training grounds near the village of Imber and the surrounding area on Salisbury plain? The MOD keeps that land closed to the general public, bar a few days each year—yet only a fortnight ago, a car rally was allowed, at which people could wander around freely over the land. Surely it is time to return that land to the village of Imber, as was promised when that land was appropriated in the war.

Mr. Hamilton: Imber is an integral part of our training area. It is difficult for us to allow perpetual public access to it, but, as the hon. Gentleman has acknowledged, we allow such access whenever possible. I will look into the matter, and write to him.

Medium Surface-to-air Missile

3. Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what progress is being made on the development and deployment of the medium surface-to-air missile.

The Minister of State for Defence Procurement (Mr. Jonathan Aitken): Work on the evaluation of medium surface-to-air missile tenders has now been completed and we are assessing the options in the context of our overall defence requirements. No decision has yet been made.

Mr. Kirkwood: Will the Minister acknowledge that, since the withdrawal of the Bloodhound missile in 1991, the United Kingdom has become one of the few NATO countries without access to medium surface-to-air missiles? He has said that Ministers have now completed their examination of the long-term costs of the development of new systems to replace the Bloodhound over the next 15 years. When will he be able to make an announcement? Does he accept that, if we do not secure a replacement within 15 years, it would be very foolish to deploy the Eurofighter without being able to protect it effectively with a missile system?

Mr. Aitken: I should point out that MSAM is not a replacement for the Bloodhound. It would provide part of a layered air defence for the United Kingdom, together with Rapiers and air defence fighters. I take account of the hon. Gentleman's point about the need for a next generation of missiles to protect the Eurofighter in certain circumstances. An announcement can be expected within the next few weeks.

Mr. Mans: Given that the RAF now has its full complement of air defence variant Tornados, is my hon. Friend satisfied with the state of British air defences?

Mr. Aitken: Yes, I confirm that we are satisfied with the state of Britain's air defences. We have made a continuing commitment to invest heavily in the United Kingdom's air defence capability in recent years: so far, we have spent well over £7 billion at 1992 prices, with more than £1 billion to come. We have well over 100 fighter aircraft and three Rapier squadrons, and we believe that they are more than adequate to meet the foreseeable threat of air attacks on the United Kingdom.

Mr. Foulkes: Will the Minister turn his attention to the proposed tactical air-to-surface missile? It would cost £3 billion and is an unnecessary addition to our nuclear capability. Will the Minister confirm last week's press reports that the Government have at last taken the Opposition's advice and rightly decided to cancel TSAM?

Mr. Aitken: Far from relying on the Opposition as a source of wisdom and advice, we regard many of their questions as coming from over-enthusiastic plumbers who race after every leak that appears in the press. The question is about MSAM; I will not be drawn into the issue of TASM, beyond saying that no decision has yet been made.

Bramcote Barracks, Nuneaton

4. Mr. Olner: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he has taken to continue the use of Bramcote barracks in the Nuneaton constituency.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Further defence uses for the site are being examined. I will, of course, keep the hon. Gentleman advised of developments.

Mr. Olner: Does not the Minister remember my bringing a deputation of civilian workers from Bramcote to see him three or four months ago? It is crucial to the local economy that Bramcote is retained in service use. I hope that the Minister will examine the matter seriously, especially when troops must be redeployed from Germany.

Mr. Hamilton: I do not want the hon. Gentleman to become over-enthusiastic, but I can tell him that we are looking very seriously at alternative Army use for the site. I hope that we shall be able to make an announcement within the next few weeks.

Volunteer Reserve Forces

5. Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the future of the volunteer reserve forces.

Mr. Rifkind: The volunteer reserves will continue to provide a highly valued contribution to our defence capability. I am sure the House will join me in expressing admiration for the dedication and enthusiasm of all who serve in them. Work is continuing on the future role of the reserves, and proposals will be announced to the House later in the year.

Mr. Brazier: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that, when we are planning the smallest Regular Army since the Napoleonic era in a very dangerous world, this is profoundly the wrong time to consider a second possible round of cuts in our already very full defence programme? Can I put it to my right hon. and learned Friend that the real debate should be about enhancing the quality of our reserves and that that should start from the top by appointing a reservist to direct the reserves, as is the case in every other major English-speaking country?

Mr. Rifkind: I note my hon. Friend's interesting latter suggestion, which may indeed be worthy of consideration. It clearly is important to ensure not only that we have the number of reserves that is thought to be suitable to our requirements, but that we continue to look at the role of the reserves, because in a changed international strategic situation it would clearly be unwise and, I think, contrary to the interests of the reserves themselves, to assume that somehow their role, which might have been suitable during the cold war, would necessarily be the most appropriate in the circumstances of today. It may be that there will be a need, for example, for changed legislation to enable the reserves to be used more ably and flexibly for a multiplicity of roles, which would have been difficult, if not impossible, in the past.

Mr. Wigley: Will the Secretary of State address himself to the fact that a number of his Department's premises in Wales are now becoming vacant? Could they be used in the context of the training of the volunteer reserves to help to provide sustenance for the local economy, which has been so devastated by certain cuts in his Department?

Mr. Rifkind: We shall naturally be willing to consider any proposal that is put to us by the hon. Gentleman or by any other hon. Member about the use of surplus assets, either for the reserves or, indeed, for any other relevant and useful role.

Sir Anthony Grant: Will my right hon. and learned Friend bear in mind the fact that not only has the Territorial Army contributed massively and valiantly this century to the defence of the nation in two world wars, but that it also has a most valuable social contribution to make? Will he therefore resist any Treasury blandishments to cut it further and do all he can to urge young people in particular to join the Territorial Army, since we shall all be the better for it?

Mr. Rifkind: I am sure that my hon. Friend's assessment is correct. I think the best contribution that we can make, both to the morale of the reserves and to the ability of the reserves to attract suitable people to their ranks is to ensure that they have a role in our defence thinking which is clearly relevant and appropriate to the needs of the 1990s.

Dr. Reid: I know that the Secretary of State remains alert, even during recesses. Did he therefore have the opportunity to read the report in The Sunday Times of 4 April, which affirmed that the Government were some £4 billion out in their three-year costing and that, as a result, they were considering further cuts, which included 12 battalions of the Territorial Army—9,600 men, bringing the number down to 52,000—and another round of compulsory redundancies, as well as five frigates? Will he therefore take this opportunity to deny that any of these are under consideration by the Government at present?

Mr. Rifkind: If the hon. Gentleman had read not only that report in The Sunday Times but the article that I wrote which The Sunday Times was good enough to publish a couple of days ago, he would have seen that I said in that article that, whenever proposals were put to Ministers, they were considered not only for their financial implications but as to whether they produced a coherent and sensible defence policy and that if they were not justified on defence grounds, the proposals would not be accepted. Therefore, these are the criteria which we shall apply not only to the reserves but to any other proposals affecting the defence programme at the present time.

Mr. Bill Walker: Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that many active volunteer reservists will be delighted that today he said that we are looking at and giving consideration to changing the law with regard to calling up reservists? That, I believe, was one of the lessons that we learned from the Gulf. Does he also recognise that another lesson from the Gulf was how effective it was to call up individual volunteer reservists in individual categories, who were able to make such an important impact on activities during that operation?

Mr. Rifkind: Yes, I think that there is no doubt that the current regulations and legislation governing the use of reserves are unnecessarily bureaucratic and complicated. For example, some weeks ago, when we wished to send one individual reservist who was fluent in Serb-Croat to Bosnia and that reservist was keen to go, it was nevertheless necessary to go through a complicated procedure, including a special report tabled before the House, before the legal power existed to carry out that relatively minor act with the volunteer who was anxious to be of service. I think that that illustrates the need for early reform in this area.

Battle of the Atlantic

6. Mr. Loyden: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how his Department has been involved in commemorating the battle of the Atlantic and the western approaches.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: My Department is responsible for the organisation of the military aspects of the commemoration. It is also working closely with the Chamber of Shipping, the Merseyside local authorities and other interested organisations to ensure that all those who took part in the battle, including members of the Merchant Navy, are properly commemorated in the events which are to take place in the Merseyside area during the last week of May.

Mr. Loyden: Does the Minister recognise that the country and, therefore the Government owe a great debt to the merchant seafarers who during the war carried our troops and military hardware to every theatre of war, at a cost of 30,189 lives and 11·5 million tonnes of British shipping? I welcome recognition, even at this late stage, of the role played by merchant seamen during the war, but does not the Minister agree that the best way of repaying the men and women who sail our ships would be to revive our Merchant Navy and get our shipyards moving? That Government activity would be welcomed both by the Merchant Navy and by our shipyard workers.

Mr. Hamilton: As the hon. Gentleman knows, the reasons for the decline in the Merchant Navy are complex, involving taxation and the high cost to shipowners of employing British labour. We are certainly ensuring that the commemoration will include members of the Merchant Navy and that their organisations will be represented. When the commemoration takes place, it will be a great fillip for Merseyside; I gather that the local authorities are catering for about 2 million visitors who are expected to attend.

Mr. Hunter: Bearing in mind the small but significant role played by South Africans in the battle of the Atlantic and the western approaches, would it not be appropriate if representatives of South Africa took part in the commemoration?

Mr. Hamilton: Yes indeed. My hon. Friend describes that role as small but significant; actually, about 10,000 South Africans served under the white ensign both in royal naval ships and in South African ships. Many more were involved in the Merchant Navy. We will ensure that an invitation goes to the South Africans, so that a South African ship may take part in the general commemoration. That invitation will go out this afternoon.

Dr. David Clark: We note, and indeed join in, the Minister's tribute to Merchant Navy and Royal Navy personnel in days past, but why does he treat the Royal Navy and the Merchant Navy of today so shamefully? Does he recall, just before Easter, sneaking out a parliamentary answer revealing that 2,300 Royal Navy personnel were to be made redundant? Will he explain to the House why, later the same evening, his Ministry revealed that the figure was really 5,000 rather than 2,300? Will he apologise to the House for withholding that information?

Mr. Hamilton: No, but I will put the record straight. There is never an ideal moment to announce another phase of redundancies, but the Royal Navy considered it important that the announcement be made before the Easter recess, so that the people concerned would know what was happening. The figure of 5,000 merely denoted forward plans for Royal Navy manpower levels; it was a purely theoretical figure based on estimates and has as much to do with contractorisation and market testing, which, as the hon. Gentleman must realise, involves replacing people in uniform with civilians, and thus does not affect the front line in any way. I am not sure that it is not a mistake to judge the efficiency of the Royal Air Force or the Royal Navy by their manpower. We should judge them on the equipments they have. The number of ships and aircraft is more significant than the number of men.

Bosnia (No-fly Zone)

7. Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent representations he has received regarding the enforcement of the no-fly zone over Bosnia.

Mr. Rifkind: I have received a number of representations from hon. Members and from members of the public.

Mr. Butler: Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that although I welcome our involvement in the imposition of the no-fly zone, what we seek in Bosnia is a no-war zone, a no-killing zone and a no-starvation zone? Bearing in mind the excellent efforts in humanitarian aid made by British men and women, will my right hon. and learned Friend continue to resist the siren calls for token military action, which has no achievable military objective, but which would be certain to destroy the humanitarian efforts?

Mr. Rifkind: We will certainly judge any proposals for military action by the twin criteria of whether they would be likely to achieve the purpose for which they were designed and what implications they would have, as my hon. Friend rightly says, for the continuation of the humanitarian effort.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: Does the Secretary of State recall that after the no-fly zone was declared and before it was implemented, the Government resisted calls for implementation on the ground that to do so might put at risk British forces and the humanitarian efforts in which they were engaged? Yet shortly before Easter, the Government acceded to the United Nations proposals for the implementation of the no-fly zone. Does not experience since then demonstrate that the no-fly zone could and should have been implemented much earlier, not least to show the resolve of the international community?

Mr. Rifkind: I do not agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman. The Government's reservations about enforcing the no-fly zone were a result of the fact that, until a few weeks ago, the Bosnian Serbs had made no attempt to breach it with combat aircraft. It seemed premature, therefore, and largely pointless to take such unnecessary action. When the Bosnian Serbs breached the zone on two occasions by the use of combat aircraft for bombing missions, it clearly became necessary for the United Nations to enforce its resolution and that is what the United Kingdom voted for.

Mr. Faber: Is not there a certain irony in the fact that we now have six RAF Tornados patrolling the skies over Bosnia, presumably ready to take unilateral aggressive action at a moment's notice, while on the ground below our troops depend for their very success and continued safety on their perceived neutrality? What steps has my right hon. and learned Friend taken to ensure that there will be no potential accident involving our air force which might jeopardise the security of our troops on the ground?

Mr. Rifkind: The Tornados that have been allocated to the enforcement of the no-fly zone are Tornado F-3s which are suitable for an air defence role and would not be used in ground attack missions. Therefore, the scenario to which my hon. Friend refers is unlikely to occur. There must, of course, always be a risk for all United Nations forces on the ground if other United Nations forces, whether British or from other countries, are carrying out missions in the air. That factor must be borne in mind through proper communications between the various United Nations units serving in Bosnia at present.

Redundancies

9. Mr. Davidson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many service personnel have been issued with compulsory redundancy notices since the beginning of 1993.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Since the beginning of 1993, 628 Army officers have been selected for compulsory redundancy.

Mr. Davidson: How many redundant officers does the Minister expect will find work elsewhere in the present circumstances of mass unemployment? Does he accept that the existing training and resettlement package is completely inadequate and does he agree that Ministry of Defence money should be used to create jobs rather than destroy them? Will he bring forward the announcement that the new Army personnel centre is being moved to the borders of my constituency in Glasgow?

Mr. Hamilton: I totally reject everything that the hon. Gentleman says. Our figures show that 70 per cent. of officers who left on redundancy during 1992-93 have either found jobs or moved overseas. That is a great mark of the efficiency of our resettlement schemes and of the suitability of the service men who leave to find jobs outside the Army. They are offering a tremendous amount to civilian life.

There is still work to be done on the Army personnel centre, but we are moving towards a decision and we will make one as soon as we can.

Mr. David Evans: Does the Minister agree that it is a bit rich for Opposition Members to talk about redundancies in Army personnel when their defence policy talks of a 25 per cent. reduction? How many thousands of people would that policy make redundant? After all, as the Minister knows, that lot over there know about redundancies because they have been redundant for 14 years.

Mr. Hamilton: There is not much that I can add to my hon. Friend's remarks: he put it extremely well. There is no doubt whatever that at some stage the Labour party must shake off its resolution, which seems to be passed annually by its conference, that defence expenditure should be cut by the large percentages that Labour Members are always talking about.

Mr. Martlew: During the Army debate on 24 February this year, my hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) brought to the attention of the House the fact that a number of soldiers serving with the Cheshire regiment in Bosnia had applied for redundancy only because their regiment was to be amalgamated. They wished to withdraw those applications when it was decided that the Cheshire regiment should be saved. The Minister refused to allow them to withdraw their notices, but said that they could appeal against them. He also said that he would take a personal interest in the matter. How many appeals were made and were any of them turned down?

Mr. Hamilton: I do not have that information at my fingertips. I made it clear that the soldiers were in a position to appeal and that their appeals would be sympathetically considered. I will check on the position and write to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. John Greenway: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the issue of the integrated Army personnel centre is still not resolved and that he is still considering York as a possible location for the centre? Does he acknowledge the attraction of York, both in terms of its location in the centre of the United Kingdom and the excellent MOD personnel who are already employed there?

Mr. Hamilton: Yes, indeed. One of the important criteria that we have used is that there should be core numbers of employed people already working in an Army personnel centre and that is one of the advantages that York gives us. Having said that, there is also the consideration, which militates against York, that we may decide in favour of an existing building rather than go for building a new one on a green-field site. Certainly, York is still within the frame and has not been ruled out.

Western European Union (Operations)

10. Mr. Jim Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which units of the British armed forces are available for operations undertaken by the Western European Union.

Mr. Rikfind: In principle, all the United Kingdom's conventional armed forces are available for military operations conducted under the auspices of the Western European Union. Military units for WEU operations would be drawn on a case-by-case basis from forces with national and NATO roles—in the latter case, after consultation with our NATO allies.

Mr. Marshall: Does the Secretary of State accept that there is a serious possibility that our resources may be overstretched in the light of our existing commitments to NATO, the United Nations, Northern Ireland and now the enhanced Western European Union? In the specific case of the Western European Union, can he give a guarantee that if the new planning cell in Brussels provides new commitments, they will be made publicly known so that the House will be able to judge whether we have sufficient resources to meet any new commitments?

Mr. Rifkind: Yes, of course, any new commitments for our armed forces must become publicly known. The new arrangements involving the Western European Union do not imply additional commitments: they simply suggest that in certain circumstances it may be more appropriate for the WEU, rather than NATO, to sponsor certain operations. That would largely depend on whether the United States and Canada were likely to be involved in a specific matter, so that is the sort of circumstance which we envisage as potentially arising.

Sir Dudley Smith: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that it would be unwise for western nations to become involved in a civil war unless that specific civil war posed a threat to the integrity of one of the union's number?

Mr. Rifkind: That is indeed the case. At present, the WEU is making a useful contribution with regard to the monitoring of shipping in the Adriatic. It is also suggested that the WEU might have a contribution to make in monitoring sanctions-breaking on the Danube. Clearly, those are the sorts of roles in which the WEU could be usefully employed as part of a wider international operation.

Mr. Macdonald: Will the Secretary of State confirm that if the full capacity of the Western European Union together with NATO, acting under the auspices of the United Nations, were deployed in Bosnia, an effective ceasefire could be imposed within a relatively short period? It is not a question of capacity that deters the Secretary of State; it is a calculation that the effort would not be worth the saving of the civilian population in Bosnia.

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman is labouring under a misunderstanding. The WEU has no assets of its own. Any assets that might be made available to the WEU are assets which would otherwise be available to NATO. The hon. Gentleman should not try to add one on top of the other and imply that there is some massive force available only if requested.

Defence Expenditure

11. Mr. Oppenheim: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received on defence expenditure levels.

Mr. Rifkind: I have received several representations on defence expenditure levels from hon. Members and members of the public. I am keen that, in this important area, we should be able to inform the public debate better than we have done in the past. I therefore commissioned some months ago, in the context of our annual long-term costing exercise, a detailed analysis of how and what resources are taken up in meeting our various commitments around the world. A great deal of work has already been done on this. I expect to report the results in the statement on the defence estimates 1993.

Mr. Oppenheim: What logic is there in consistently calling for massive defence cuts of 25 per cent.—equivalent to more than the Royal Air Force—as Labour conferences still do, supported by many of their Front-Bench Members of Parliament, and then complaining every time that the Government, as a result of their much smaller cuts, have to close a depot or merge a regiment? Most ludicrous of all, the Leader of the Opposition struts and postures as the tough guy, Bomber Smith, demanding action in Bosnia.

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must relate his question to the question on the Order Paper and not concern himself with Opposition policies. Does the Secretary of State wish to make a response?

Mr. Rifkind rose——

Madam Speaker: I am sure that the Secretary of State's response will be perfectly in order.

Mr. Rifkind: Of course, Madam Speaker, that goes without saying. In the debate about defence expenditure levels, it is crucial that the Opposition follow the views of the Government and do not call for expenditure cuts, yet complain if difficult decisions have to be taken.

Mr. Mackinlay: When contemplating the expenditure of Her Majesty's armed forces and participating in the debate to which he has just referred, will the Secretary of State explain to the House why there has been a massive overspend in the construction, equipping and commissioning of HMS Fort Victoria? It is a scandalous case over which he has presided as Secretary of State for Defence. Why is there delay, why has there been an overspend, and whose heads will roll?

Mr. Rifkind: I assure the hon. Gentleman that in this project, as in any other, there will be the most rigorous analysis of the causes of the overspending to ensure that it does not recur.

Service Legal Departments

12. Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to bring together the legal departments of the three services.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: There are no such plans at present.

Mr. Townsend: I hope that my right hon. Friend might have a look at the matter. Is he aware that the numbers involved are small these days? After a serious cut in the number of regiments, squadrons and ships, should not we look for savings in the tail of the defence services?

Mr. Hamilton: Yes. Since my hon. Friend raised the matter, I have had a look at it. As he said, the only area in which an amalgamation could be effected would be between the Army and RAF legal departments, which employ 50 and 25 people respectively. That possibility has been considered, but it has been found that no appreciable savings could be made. Economies of scale can be achieved from the incorporation of the Army legal department in the Adjutant General's Corps.

Mr. Dalyell: How come that the Ministry of Defence apparently cannot make savings when the Lord Chancellor is asking the rest of legal aid to do so?

Mr. Hamilton: The savings that we seek are obviously in terms of reducing overheads. There are no overheads to be reduced in the small legal departments. As I have said already, the Army legal department has been incorporated in the Adjutant General's Corps. That will give all the advantages of savings in overheads.

As I am sure that the hon. Gentleman knows, the Lord Chancellor was worried about the level of legal aid paid, which is a rather different question altogether.

Damaged Fishing Gear (Isle of Wight)

13. Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has made to the Belgian Navy about compensating Isle of Wight fishermen for damaged gear.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Several representations have been made by my Department to the Belgian navy, via its defence attaché in London, in respect of one fisherman's claim for damaged gear.

Mr. Field: Will my hon. Friend review the arrangements for all NATO navies that operate inside United Kingdom territorial waters to compensate fishermen for damage to gear? The arrangements should be the same as for the Royal Navy. It came as a complete surprise to me and my constituents that a navy that is a member of NATO and operating in our home waters was not liable to pay compensation for damage to the gear of British fishermen.

Mr. Hamilton: I assure my hon. Friend that if the navy had been on a NATO exercise, the claim would have been settled by the Ministry of Defence and a subsequent claim for 75 per cent. of the total would have been made to the Belgians. In the case to which my hon. Friend refers, it was not a NATO exercise. The Belgian navy was operating on its own. As my hon. Friend knows, the accident happened in March last year. It is for the Belgians to settle this claim, which has been going on for much too long. My Department will do everything that it can to hasten the settlement of this claim.

Bosnia

14. Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the situation in Bosnia.

Mr. Rifkind: British forces continue to play a major part in supporting the United Nations in the former Yugoslavia. They operate in difficult and frequently dangerous conditions with the superb professionalism that we have come to expect. I am sure that the House will join me in paying tribute to all those involved in this important work.

Mr. Macdonald: Will the Defence Secretary have another go at answering the question that I asked earlier? If NATO forces were to be fully deployed in Bosnia under United Nations auspices, would not they have the capability of imposing an effective ceasefire within a relatively short period of time?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman's question implies that military involvement by NATO would be a short, sharp exercise. He has to accept that very few would agree with that judgment. He might reflect on the fact that the United Nations operation in Cyprus, an infinitely less difficult operation, has continued for over 28 years. The hon. Gentleman should consider whether that might apply in the case of Bosnia.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Parry: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 20 April.

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): This morning, I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Parry: Will the Prime Minister today decide when he intends to visit Liverpool, where he can meet local trade union leaders to discuss the very high level of unemployment? Incidentally, he might visit Liverpool, Riverside, which has the highest level of unemployment in England, Scotland and Wales—32 per cent. Will he also consider visiting Liverpool next month for the commemoration of the battle of the Atlantic and western approaches? Her Majesty the Queen is coming and, in 1940, Mr. Winston Churchill, the then Prime Minister, came several times, as did King George VI. Will the Prime Minister consider coming there?

The Prime Minister: I have indeed received an invitation to attend the 50th anniversary of the battle of the Atlantic, in which Liverpool and its people played such a significant part. I have accepted that invitation and I look forward to that event very much indeed.

I am aware of the very high level of unemployment in the hon. Gentleman's constituency. It has fallen over recent years, but it is still far higher than in many areas in the United Kingdom and is one of the worst pockets of unemployment anywhere in the country. I will not be able to visit Riverside on this occasion, but I understand the particular problems faced by the hon. Gentleman and if he, with a small delegation of his constituents, wishes to come to see me to discuss the problem, I will be happy to meet them.

Mr. Ottaway: Is my right hon. Friend aware that one of Norway's largest ship owners, Gearbulk, has recently decided to relocate to London, giving as its reason that it wants to be at the centre of things? Does my right hon. Friend agree that this demonstrates that Britain, with a low corporate tax structure and a Conservative Government, remains the best place in the world in which to do business?

The Prime Minister: I was not aware of that piece of welcome news and I am delighted to hear what my hon. Friend has said. We very much welcome inward investment from both within and beyond the European Community. We are determined to maintain in this country the economic circumstances and the relatively low on-costs to employment which will continue to attract inward investment.

Mr. John Smith: While it is essential that the sanctions against Serbia be intensified and properly enforced, as indeed they should have been months ago, is it not now necessary for a clear ultimatum to be issued to the Serbs that they will not be allowed to continue their aggression unchecked and that, if they continue that aggression, their lines of supply within Bosnia will be subject to air attack?

The Prime Minister: We had a lengthy statement by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs yesterday in which he set out the present position and the discussions we are having with our partners in the United Nations. The House recognised yesterday that the road to further action, particularly if it leads to military action, which is what the right hon. and learned Gentleman's question implied, is fraught with peril. Once one goes down it, there is no turning back. We must first be confident that that is the right direction.

Mr. John Smith: While there are risks in any course of action, and I would not seek to minimise them, do not they have to be weighed carefully against the possibly greater risks of non-action? Surely what is badly needed is a demonstration of United Nations determination. How will the Government respond, for example, if the Serbs proceed to take the crucial towns of Gorazde and Zepa? Should not they be warned now that such action on their part will not be tolerated?

The Prime Minister: As the right hon. and learned Gentleman heard my right hon. Friend say again yesterday, we are not excluding those options; we are considering them seriously and discussing them with our allies. I have spoken recently with both the French and American Presidents, but we have not yet reached a decision about the balance of advantage in those particular courses. They could cause fighting to escalate, civilian casualties to rise and an end to the humanitarian operation.

On that last point, I remind the House that it was the expectation in the House some months ago that over the winter hundreds of thousands of Bosnians would die of starvation and lack of medicine. That has not happened because we have managed to sustain the humanitarian operation. Neither my right hon. Friend nor I would willingly throw that away.

Mr. Dickens: Following the tragic circumstances surrounding the death of many British citizens who were members of a cult in the United States of America, will my right hon. Friend have conversations with the Home Secretary with a view to setting up a working party to see how we can best limit the recruitment of British citizens into those evil cults?

The Prime Minister: There are a number of undesirable cults and I share my hon. Friend's concern. It would be difficult to focus legislation to restrict the establishment of cults or religious movements because it would be difficult to determine what groups should be included in the legislation and what groups should be excluded. However, we have powers under the criminal law and we are prepared and willing to use them to regulate the behaviour of individuals when they may infringe the rights of other people. We also have powers under the immigration laws to prohibit the entry of people who may wish to establish such cults, if it is thought that they would be damaging to our interests.

Mr. Ashdown: In the Prime Minister's previous answer, he rightly referred to the importance of humanitarian aid. Has he noticed that today the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees has called for the establishment of a United Nations protected safe haven in Zepa and Gorazde? How will he respond to that question?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman will know that the UNHCR wants to set up safe areas by agreement with the parties in those areas and does not want the United Nations to be an active participant in the conflict. To that extent, it differs quite radically from the proposals that the right hon. Gentleman was kind enough to write to me about some days ago.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: Does my right hon. Friend agree that if there has to be further military intervention in Bosnia, it should be done under NATO command with American participation, backed by United Nations resolutions supported by Russia?

The Prime Minister: I see no other circumstances in which it would be practicable to expect any military authority to be there and to succeed. Anything short of action in the circumstances set out by my hon. Friend would be unacceptable and would be unlikely to be agreed. Those are only the circumstances, but I stress that that would be a very grave step and it is not yet the policy of any of the major Governments in the United Nations.

Q2. Mr. Ernie Ross: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 20 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Ross: Has the Prime Minister had a chance to study the public sector borrowing requirement figure announced today? Does he realise that £9·5 billion is the highest recorded figure of any Government for any one month? It is £1 million more than the Chancellor announced in his Budget last month. Does the Prime Minister share the concern of many forecasters, who believe that that points to a real underlying problem about our economy? What is he going to do about it?

The Prime Minister: It is an interesting question from the hon. Gentleman. I hope I can assume from it that the hon. Gentleman is so concerned about borrowing that he will support our new controls on public spending. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will support us in imposing limits on public sector pay and on keeping caps on council spending. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will explain why he supported the Delors proposals for Community spending which would have cost us millions. He might explain why his hon. Friend the shadow Chancellor said that he was prepared to debate with the Community over our rebate. All those matters relate to our borrowing requirement; upon none of them have we ever had the support of the hon. Gentleman or any right hon. or hon. Member in his party. Words from him about restraints on public spending are very hollow indeed.

Q3. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 20 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Greenway: Does my right hon. Friend agree that teachers have a moral duty to do their very best for their pupils and that that means carrying out testing this summer? Is my right hon. Friend aware that Britain spends a higher percentage of its GDP on education than Germany and Japan, but that in Germany children are taught and tested over 1,260 hours per year, whereas children in Britain are taught for as little as 850 hours per year and would remain untested if some teacher unions have their way, supported by the disruptive attitude of the Labour party?

The Prime Minister: As a former head teacher, my hon. Friend speaks with particular authority on this matter. A boycott of testing would certainly not be in the interests of our children. We need tests—and need them this year—as Sir Ron Dearing, among others, has made clear. My hon. Friend is right that our principal competitors have national curricula and regular testing. Any attempt to sabotage our reforms could damage our long-term ability to compete and damage the education of our children.

Q5. Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 20 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Llwyd: The Prime Minister will be aware of the recent integrated administration control system forms which have been issued at the behest of the European Community. These are a great headache to the farming community because they are time limited; they have to be in by 15 May. Farmers also have to have plans mapped out in hectares. In my constituency, for example, only two thirds of land has been surveyed for that purpose. I urge the Prime Minister and his colleagues to ask the EC to extend the time limit and to consider defraying the expenses of those who have spent on survey fees privately for this purpose.

The Prime Minister: There are difficulties with this and I sympathise with what the hon. Gentleman has said. Although I doubt whether it is feasible to extend the time limit, my right hon. Friend the Minister for Agriculture is seeking to help farmers in that situation within the rules of the terms of the scheme. Maps that can be used are available, but we have always recognised that some farmers may have difficulty getting maps of the right scale. Where maps cannot be obtained, farmers should provide the best alternative that they can.

South Africa

Q6. Mr. Hunter: To ask the Prime Minister what representations he has recently made to, or received from, the South African Government regarding political change in South Africa.

The Prime Minister: We are in regular contact at all levels with the South African Government and other parties involved in the current constitutional negotiations. I shall be seeing Mr. Mandela and Chief Buthelezi in the next few weeks. I am also in touch with President de Klerk.

Mr. Hunter: As the tragedy of South Africa unfolds and, for the time being, the men of violence have their way, will my right hon. Friend urge President de Klerk not to give ground to the enemies of democracy or mob rule, but, rather, to continue negotiations, especially with moderate black leaders, so that the new South Africa may be better than the old?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend knows South Africa well and I agree with him that negotiations are the only way to reach the goal of a non-racial, democratic South Africa. The concessions that the ANC is seeking, covering both the election date and the establishment of a transitional executive council, are matters for the constitutional negotiations. I urge all parties to address issues in that forum.

Engagements

Q7. Mr. Connarty: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 20 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Connarty: Has the Prime Minister had, as I have, the shared joy of being present at the birth of his children? Does he share with me and the Royal College of Midwives deep concern at the massive increase in the use of Caesarian sections in all parts of the United Kingdom? Is he aware that I have been told in parliamentary replies that the rate has risen from 5·3 to 13 per cent. in England and to 14 per cent. in Scotland and that women are now threatened in one out of eight cases with surgery in what should be the pleasant experience of childbirth? Does he think that it is time that we had a childbirth charter to protect women from the scalpel when they should have a normal childbirth?

The Prime Minister: The answer to the first part of the question is yes, on two occasions. The second part is essentially a matter for the individual mother and her surgeon and doctor. I confess that I was not aware of the growth of Caesarian section births and it is a matter which, in the light of the hon. Gentleman's remarks, I shall refer to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State.

Business of the House

3.31 pm

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Tony Newton): With permission, Madam Speaker, I shall make a short business statement.

The business already announced for tomorrow will now be preceded by a debate on early-day motion 1782.

[That this House regrets that the Chairman of Ways and Means, having selected Amendment 27 to the European Communities (Amendment) Bill, which has support from honourable Members on both sides of the House, having called a Right honourable Member to speak on that amendment, and having allowed a debate upon it to take place, should then have decided, contrary to normal practice, not to permit a division to take place upon that amendment, thus denying the House an opportunity to reach a decision on an issue relating to the applicability of the Protocol on Social Policy contained in the Maastricht Treaty, a protocol which Her Majesty's Government held to be so important that it sought and obtained a special opt-out from it for the United Kingdom; and, in the light of these considerations, and the long term significance of this ruling for parliamentary debates on all future legislation, calls upon the Chairman of Ways and Means to re-consider his ruling forthwith, and to permit the Committee to reach a decision on that amendment.]

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): I thank the Leader of the House for that statement. Are there any major implications for the timing of the rest of tomorrow's debates? More important, can he confirm my understanding that, although hon. Members in all parts of the House, and in particular my hon. Friends on the Front Bench who deal with foreign affairs, will continue to argue for the House to have an opportunity on Report to decide on amendment No. 27, even if the motion for debate tomorrow were passed, no vote in Committee on that amendment would procedurally now be possible?

Mr. Newton: The answer to the latter point raised by the right hon. Lady is that the point in the Bill at which amendment No. 27 would have been voted on, had it been chosen in that way, occurred at about 10 o'clock last night and has now passed.

The answer to the first part of the question about the implications for the timing of further proceedings is that that is in the hands of the Committee because it will be determined by the amount of time that hon. Members wish to take in debating the early-day motion to which I referred.

Mr. Tom King (Bridgwater): Is my right hon. Friend aware that I suspect that many hon. Members deeply regret that some right hon. and hon. Members decided to table the motion—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."]—and is it not an extremely dangerous precedent if the rulings of the Chair in deciding what amendments shall be selected or what votes shall be taken are to be determined by a majority vote in the House?

Does that not also have serious implications, as we shall have to return to the matter on Report, if the motion is approved? That would put the Chair in an impossible position. Either it will have acceded to pressure coming from those tabling the motion or find that the Chair, and Madam Speaker, could face a similar motion. Is it not highly unfair to the Chairman of Ways and Means, whom many of us feel has been placed in an almost impossible position when he has been carrying out his duties with great good humour and tolerance?

Madam Speaker: Before I call the Leader of the House to reply to that question, I ask hon. Members not to anticipate tomorrow's debate. This is a very narrow statement indeed and questions should be confined to its content. Let us not anticipate what will take place tomorrow.

Mr. Newton: Madam Speaker, obviously I am grateful for that guidance, but I think it was clear from the reaction of the House that my right hon. Friend's regret will be widely shared. I express the hope that right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House will wish tomorrow to reaffirm something which I believe to be very important for the whole of our proceedings and for all groups in the House—support for the authority of the Chair.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): Does the Leader of the House accept that the motion is a de facto motion of no confidence in the Chair, and, as such, is a gratuitous move? Since it has been tabled in the names of right hon. and hon. Members who are predominantly members of the official Opposition, why is the time for the debate not being taken out of time set aside today for the official Opposition?

Mr. Newton: I note the point that the hon. Gentleman raises. It was felt right, as we considered these matters, to provide an opportunity for reflection and for the motion to appear on the Order Paper, and then for it to be debated if it was maintained. That is the position that we have adopted. I think that was right. I am grateful for the implicit support that the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) expressed for the position that I put a moment ago.

Mr. Michael Jopling (Westmorland and Lonsdale): In view of the fact that the indications from the Opposition Front Bench are that they will not support the motion, will the Leader of the House make renewed efforts to get those who have tabled the motion to withdraw it? Does he agree that the House usually does itself considerable damage when it seeks not to trust and support the Speaker and those who have the extremely difficult task of selecting amendments and making other judgments? Does he agree that in such cases we nearly always get into situations which put the House at a huge disadvantage? In this case, is it not particularly inappropriate when we can revert to the matter on Report?

Mr. Newton: I agree with every word that my right hon. Friend has said. I hope that his request—perhaps it could be described as a plea—will be heeded by those who have chosen to table the motion. I add my voice to those seeking further reconsideration even now.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): I thank the Leader of the House for following the precedents of the House in finding time to debate a motion of this character, last moved, as he will know, by a former Lord Chancellor, Sir Elwyn Jones, during the passage of the European Communities Act 1972, and supported by all Opposition Members.

Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that it is a House of Commons matter since the motion tabled by 10 per cent. or more of the total membership of the House touches upon the future proceedings of the House in respect of all legislation and not only the European Communities (Amendment) Bill? Will he give the House an assurance that this will be seen, contrary to practice, not as a party matter but as a House of Commons matter on which every hon. Member must reach his or her own conclusion?

Mr. Newton: It is certainly a House of Commons matter. The reaction of many right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House shows that, as it is a House of Commons matter, they wish that the right hon. Gentleman would reconsider his action.

As for the right hon. Gentleman's reference to debates on earlier occasions, I think that he will find that there is no clear parallel for the motion which he has tabled in the example which he has chosen from 1972, when the motion was presented specifically as an attack on the Government rather than on the Chairman of Ways and Means. There is no doubt that the right hon. Gentleman's motion is intended as an attack on the Chairman of Ways and Means.

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Eltham): My right hon. Friend will probably tell me that, because of the terms of the motion which has been selected, early-day motion 1792, which I have tabled, will fall because it is on the same subject.

[That this House would wish it to be understood that Tories opposing the European Communities (Amendment) Bill, opposed to the Social Chapter, have wished to vote for the Chapter with socialists approving the Chapter and in support of the Bill and that it should be understood that the upset caused by the declaration by Government that Parliament would be recommended to accept the new clause that would give a clear opportunity to vote for or against the Social Chapter, after approval of the Bill, is because those for and against the Chapter, and those against and for the Bill will be able to vote against each other rather than together; and that it will be understood that this simple way forward should have support from all who desire clarity in politics and separation between people with opposite views.]

Will it be possible in the debate to discuss early-day motions 1790 and 1791, which point out that the opponents——

Madam Speaker: Order. That question has nothing to do with the Leader of the House. I said earlier that this is a confined statement. It is a supplementary statement. It concerns only the change of business and not early-day motions tabled by the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Bottomley rose——

Madam Speaker: Is the hon. Gentleman asking the Leader of the House a question that he can answer and that he has the authority to answer?

Mr. Bottomley: I am grateful to you, Madam Speaker. In essence, I am asking whether an amendment may be tabled to the motion that has been selected stating that the House expresses confidence in the impartial way in which the Chairman has conducted our proceedings up to now.

Mr. Newton: Madam Speaker, you will probably agree that the issue of amendment and selection is certainly one for you.

Madam Speaker: Leave it to me.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): My question relates to the implications of the statement for the rest of tomorrow's business. We were expecting a full day's debate on the subject of the referendum and a vote at 10 pm. Will the Leader of the House guarantee that the debate and vote on a vital matter such as the referendum will not be truncated and shunted into the early hours of the morning? However inconvenient it might be for the two Front Bench teams, we must have a legitimate debate and vote on the vital matter of the referendum.

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman must understand that I cannot sensibly add to what I said—I think to the right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett)—earlier. Ultimately, it is for the House to determine how long the debate proceeds.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that during tomorrow's debate it will be in order to refer to comments made by the Chairman of Ways and Means on a Scottish television programme at the weekend when he said, in effect, that any amendment tabled that was judged to be a wrecking amendment would not be selected or voted on?

Mr. Newton: I did not have the opportunity of seeing the interview to which my hon. Friend has referred, but, subject to your approval, Madam Speaker, it is possible that it will be in order in tomorrow's debate to refer to an interview of that sort.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Is the Leader of the House aware that some of us believe that there should not be any fuss or bother about the fact that some of us think that the Chairman of Ways and Means was the one who set the dangerous precedent, not my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) and other hon. Members who signed the motion? The Chairman decided to ignore the wishes of the Leader of the Opposition about a vote on amendment No. 27. In doing so, he made a rod for his own back——

Madam Speaker: Order. That does not relate to tomorrow's business.

Mr. Skinner rose——

Madam Speaker: Order. If the hon. Gentleman will contain himself, he may well be called in tomorrow's debate.

Several hon. Members rose——

Madam Speaker: I shall now move on.

Points of Order

3.43 pm

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. A few minutes ago the deputy leader of the Labour party, my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett), said that, even if the motion were passed tomorrow, there would be no possibility of a vote in the Committee stage.

I know that this is a difficult question, and I would have posed it to you earlier had I known that the matter would arise, but would you consider overnight whether the House could defy a decision taken in the House that amendment No. 27 should be put forthwith? If the motion is carried tomorrow, the House will have said that it is to be put forthwith. Therefore, will you, Madam Speaker, consider overnight whether the deputy leader of the Labour party inadvertently made a serious error when asking her question?

Madam Speaker: I cannot anticipate what is likely to happen tomorrow.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. During the exchanges on the business statement, it was suggested that the issue was a House of Commons matter. Unfortunately, the Leader of the House did not have an opportunity to make clear whether there will be a Government three-line Whip on Tory Members to vote against the motion in order to defend the original decision not to call a vote on amendment No. 27.

Madam Speaker: That is a serious issue, but not one that relates to the change of business. I shall move on. I think that Mr. Banks has a point of order. Is that right?

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Yes, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: As usual.

Mr. Banks: Yes, Madam Speaker; but this one might actually be a point of order. You will be aware that questions tabled to the Prime Minister on the cost of security provision for the Prime Minister are always given the ministerial response that, on security grounds, it is not policy to divulge security costs, which people can understand. However, in today's edition of The Guardian, in the diary column of all places, is an item that says that the cost of protecting the Prime Minister's home at Great Stukeley was £1·2 million in the year to 31 March 1993.

Dame Peggy Fenner (Medway): That is less than the cost of protecting Salman Rushdie.

Mr. Banks: Yes. Some might think that to be a high cost and that Group 4 could provide the service more cheaply; but it would probably supply tea and biscuits to those trying to break in.

If that information can be provided to a county council, surely it should be made available to hon. Members when they make such inquiries.

Madam Speaker: I advise the hon. Gentleman not to believe everything that he reads in the press. On the more serious point, that is entirely a matter for Ministers who have to take responsibility for any refusal to answer certain categories of question.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. A few moments ago you said that the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) was important, but that it was not a matter for business questions. The motion to be debated on Wednesday, tabled by my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) and supported by a number of us—we do not believe that it can be personalised in the way that some are trying to do today—should be subject to a free vote. Therefore, would it not be unfortunate, to say the least, if there were any impression inside or outside the House that the vote at the conclusion of tomorrow's debate will be subject to whipping, be it by the Government or the Opposition Front Bench? It should be a free vote, and I hope that that will be confirmed by all concerned.

Madam Speaker: The hon. Gentleman is a member of the Procedure Committee and should well know that whether there is a free vote or otherwise is nothing to do with the Speaker.

Mr. John McAllion (Dundee, East): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I refer you to the transcript of the interview that the Chairman of Ways and Means gave to the BBC television programme "Scottish Lobby" last Sunday in which he explained that his decision not to allow a vote on amendment No. 27 was based upon his judgment that two other Opposition amendments, new clauses 74 and 75, were slightly more workable. Will you therefore confirm that, if those new clauses were withdrawn by the Opposition, a vote could be taken on amendment No. 27, so that there would be no necessity for tomorrow's debate on early-day motion 1782?

Madam Speaker: I cannot comment on proceedings in Committee.

Criminal Justice (Amendment)

3.46 pm

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to restore to the courts the power to take full account of a criminal's previous convictions, sentence and response thereto in determining sentences.

In a recent case in London a man was convicted by magistrates of his fifth offence of driving while disqualified and he was, rightly, sent to prison for six months. When the Court of Appeal quashed the sentence, one of the judges sadly remarked:

"The Act"—

the Criminal Justice Act 1991—

"may not make sense but it has to be obeyed."

Similarly, in a recent case in Surrey, a burglar who had just completed a four-year prison sentence for burglary came before the court for four further offences. On examining the Act, the court found that the only sentence that could be imposed was a 75-hour community service order.

As a result of such cases, some hon. Members may feel that the Act is not working well and requires some modification. That is not my view. I take the view that it is wrong in principle to interfere with the right of the courts to take account of previous offences.

The problem to which I have been referring relates to section 29 of the Criminal Justice Act 1991. Less well known is section 1(2), which provides:

"the court shall not pass a custodial offence on the offender unless it is of the opinion—

(a) that the offence, or the combination of the offence and one other offence associated with it"— in other words, the court can look at only two offences before it—

"was so serious that only such a sentence can be justified for the offence; or

(b) where the offence is a violent or sexual offence . . ."

In Winchester recently, a Department of Social Security fraud case involved a man who had stolen more than £20,000. Because each week's payment was considered a separate offence, in deciding whether the man should go to prison, the court could only take into account two weeks' fraud involving a relatively small sum, which resulted in a small fine.

The difficulty originated in two perverse Court of Appeal rulings—the first in 1981—that, because a person could be sentenced only once for any one offence, it followed that previous offences could not be regarded as aggravating features of a crime except in the limited sense of diminishing mitigating factors. That doctrine is so completely daft that it could have been devised only by exceptionally clever people. Nevertheless, it found its way into section 29 of the 1991 Act, and the House passed that portion of the legislation with virtually no objection, except from my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Sir I. Lawrence)—though there were many debates and several votes on other parts of the Bill.

It is a serious matter that the courts cannot take account of previous offences or of more than two offences in a particular batch. The interplay of those two sets of provisions magnifies the problem. If a man is given a community service order and fails while under it to be a good citizen, committing a crime every night, because he agreed to honour the order, he cannot be taken back to court and be told, "You are not observing the order properly because you are continuing to commit crimes." He cannot be sent to prison for the original offence.

Section 29 of the 1991 Act does not usually allow the court, in sentencing the offender for any subsequent crimes, to take account of the fact that the individual was continually breaching the order by committing those crimes. In other words, it is now virtually impossible to send a person to prison for most crimes against property.

Recently, the Lord Chief Justice said:

"However forward thinking the penologists, criminologists and bureaucrats in Government Departments may be, their views should not be allowed to prevail so as to impose a sentencing regime which is incomprehensible or unacceptable to right-thinking people. If that happens, there will be a real risk of aggrieved parties taking the law into their own hands."

That view has been backed by the Magistrates Association, a number of chief constables, and the Police Federation.

At a time of great obsession with a small number of wrongful convictions—and, sadly, that obsession seems to have extended to the Royal Commission on criminal justice—my constituents are far more worried about the large number of criminals who are getting off without a conviction or with a derisory sentence. Today, only 3 per cent. of recorded crime results in a court conviction. As the result of the two provisions of the 1991 Act in question, in most cases, if no violence is involved, it is no longer possible to send the offender to prison.

The Lord Chief Justice's warning is already reaching fruition. In Canterbury high street, a group of vigilantes broke into a squat that was a notorious centre of crime and, in a violent incident, burnt out the squatters. In a village in my constituency, a known burglar who had committed a string of burglaries against elderly people but who had to be released each time by the court was beaten up in broad daylight.

In the celebrated Taylor-Owen case, a jury of 12 people unanimously endorsed a serious crime by finding Mr. Owen not guilty. The House will remember that Mr. Owen took a shotgun to Mr. Taylor, who had run down and killed Mr. Owen's 14-year-old son. The jury was comprised of local people who were familiar with the activities of the Taylor family, and in effect they endorsed a serious crime of retaliation by finding Mr. Owen not guilty, not just of attempted murder but even of possessing a firearm, which was an offence to which Mr. Owen had confessed. [Laughter.] It would be funny if it were not so tragic.

The truth is that offences against property, particularly burglaries, strike at the very heart of family and community. To those of us who live in comfortable middle-class areas, a burglary simply means a hassle with the insurance company in most cases; to a poor family who cannot afford insurance and may have been burgled five or six times, it can mean the destruction of their way of life. They may stop going out in the evening because they do not want to leave their houses unattended.

If the law is not seen to address this vital need—if it is not seen to be preventing crimes against property—the ugly fact is that people will take the law into their own hands. It is utterly pointless for us to wring our hands and condemn them for doing so. We shall see a growth in the ugly vigilante retaliation that is a feature of American society.

[Mr. Julian Brazier]

Let me end where I began. I should like two modifications to be made to the Criminal Justice Act 1991—much of which I support; it contains some sensible provisions relating to violent crime. First, I should like to strike out section 29 so that courts can take full account of previous offences. Secondly, I should like to modify the wording of section 1(2)(a) so that a court with a batch of offences before it can look at them all together, not just at two of them.

I ask hon. Members on both sides of the House to vote for the Bill.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Julian Brazier, Mr. Andrew Rowe, Mr. Edward Garnier, Mr. David Tredinnick, Mr. Roger Gale, Mr. Graham Riddick, Mr. Ian Taylor, Mr. Bob Dunn, Mr. Keith Mans, Mr. John Marshall, Mr. Michael Brown and Mr. John Sykes.

Criminal Justice (Amendment)

Mr. Julian Brazier accordingly presented a Bill to restore to the courts the power to take full account of a criminal's previous convictions, sentence and response thereto in determining sentences: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 7 May, and to be printed. [Bill 181.]

Opposition Day

[11TH ALLOTTED DAY]

Schools

Madam Speaker: Before we start the debate, I must announce that I must limit speeches to 10 minutes between 6 pm and 8 pm, and that I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

3.56 pm

Mrs. Ann Taylor (Dewsbury): I beg to move,

That this House believes that there is an urgent need for stability in the nation's schools with decision-making in education based on developing a consensus rather than centralising power in the hands of the Secretary of State for Education, and that the current difficulties and instability associated with Key Stage testing are caused by the Secretary of State refusing to listen to parents, governors and teachers; and calls on the Secretary of State to withdraw the compulsion on schools to carry out the Key Stage 3 tests in English and Technology and to follow the Key Stage model introduced by Government Ministers in Scotland, pending a genuine consultative review.

It is customary in our debates to declare any interests. As the House knows, I—along with members of other parties—act as a parliamentary consultant to the Association of Teachers and Lecturers, although I do not speak on its behalf today, any more than have Conservative Members when they have acted in the same capacity. However, I have one particular and important interest: I have two children at primary school. I therefore have a vested interest in ensuring that the quality of education on offer in our schools is the best possible, and that we make a reality of the opportunities that should be provided for all our children.

Like other parents, I am alarmed by the pressures that are bearing down on our schools—not just the constant need for fund raising, but the amount of chopping and changing experienced by parents, and the weight of instruction that is coming into schools from the Department for Education on an almost daily basis. It is important to bear that in mind, because it provides the background for today's debate.

Mr. John Bowis (Battersea): The hon. Lady says that she is a parent, with children in primary school. Does she intend to support calls to parents not to let their children go into school on the day of the tests, or will she denounce the Socialist Education Association which made that call?

Mrs. Taylor: I shall have some interesting suggestions to make, which I hope the hon. Gentleman will be willing to consider, about what parents ought to do. I intend also to say a word about the experience of my own children with the standard assessment tasks. If the hon. Gentleman will wait, I shall certainly answer his question.

The problem is that parents see the pressures on our schools. They do not understand, any more than I do, why Ministers, who claim that they want to get the Government off our backs, are filling every shelf in every school with thousands of pieces of paper from the Department for Education. Parents know that teachers are the buffers—that they are absorbing the pressure in order to minimise disruption in the classroom caused by the constant instructions from Whitehall. Sometimes, the pace of change has been so hectic that Ministers changed the instructions before the last set of changes could be implemented.

Governors also understand the consequences of the frenzied nature of the Government's approach to these changes in education. It is, I believe, fair to say that the build-up of pressure on our schools is clear for all to see. In the past 14 years, there have been 18 pieces of legislation. Yet another Bill is now in the other place, having been pushed through the House of Commons with the Government's usual contempt for democratic scrutiny.

The Opposition have chosen this subject for debate today precisely because this week sees the start of the school term for many thousands of children—a term which should see the culmination of the year's work.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim (Amber Valley): Does the hon. Lady recall that last year's tests for seven-year-olds, which her party opposed strenuously, were a valuable exercise, in that they revealed serious shortcomings in reading and arithmetic in a significant proportion of pupils? Her party was wrong in opposing the tests then. Does she not think that it is just possible that she is also wrong in this instance?

Mrs. Taylor: The hon. Gentleman is downright wrong. My party did not oppose the tests. It was not those tests that showed up the lamentable lack of progress under 14 years of Conservative government. I sometimes wonder how Conservative Members can take any pride in their education record when they have to tell us of the dismal failures of our education system after 14 years of Conservative government.

Mr. Graham Riddick (Colne Valley): But the reality is that the National Union of Teachers is calling for the boycott of all tests, including those for seven-year-olds. The hon. Lady, it would appear, has just given her support to the tests for seven-year-olds. Will she therefore join me in condemning the NUT which wishes to boycott all tests, including those for seven-year-olds?

Mrs. Taylor: No, I shall not. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will read the motion on the Order Paper, which says exactly what should happen about the tests for seven-year-olds. I hope, too, that he supports the Scottish Office Ministers, who have already resolved this problem. I do not understand why Conservative Members, who have supported certain changes in Scotland, cannot accept that those changes should be introduced in England.

Mr. Rod Richards (Clwyd, North-West): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Taylor: No. I have given way three times already, and I want to make a bit of progress. I assure the hon. Gentleman that I do not intend to leave this issue, and that there will be plenty of time for interventions.

The Opposition have chosen this subject for debate because we believe that the school term that has just started is important. It should see the culmination of the year's work and the normal assessment of children so that parents may receive a report on the progress of their children. That is what should happen during this school term.

However, if the Secretary of State gets his way, the normal teaching pattern that teachers have struggled to develop will be disrupted by tests in which no one—parents, governors or teachers—has confidence. Indeed, even the Secretary of State himself does not seem to have confidence in the tests. The significant aspect of the testing arrangements that he has imposed is that, the more that parents hear and learn of his proposals, the less confidence they have in him and in them.

Mr. James Pawsey (Rugby and Kenilworth): Despite what the hon. Lady says, does she not agree that the chairman of the School Curriculum and Assessment Authority has said that the tests should go forward this year so that experience can be gained which can be used in devising the tests that will take place next year and in the following years?

Mrs. Taylor: Many parents are fed up with their children being used as guinea pigs in the Secretary of State's experiments.

We must consider how the Government have got themselves into this position. The arguments surrounding this year's tests are the culmination of concern over the past few years about the increasing powers taken by the Secretary of State over what goes on in the classroom from day to day.

The national curriculum was introduced by the right hon. Member for Mole Valley (Mr. Baker), and the policy was initially welcomed by all political parties and interest groups, but Ministers have transformed it into an educational straitjacket which confines and dictates what can and cannot be taught. Perhaps that is why the Secretary of State's chief ally in all this, the former chairman of the National Curriculum Council, has just sent his daughter to an independent school, which does not have to follow the national curriculum that he has devised for other children.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): Am I right in recalling that the Labour party fought the general election at least in part on a pledge to modernise the national curriculum? Will the hon. Lady tell the House what was meant by that?

Mrs. Taylor: Yes, I confirm that, and I shall send the hon. Gentleman a copy of my article which appeared in The Times Educational Supplement some weeks ago, outlining exactly how we could have a framework for a national curriculum rather than the prescribed national syllabus that Ministers are imposing on us.

The most significant point, and the thing that Conservative Members need to understand above all else, is that the tests prescribed for the key stages are not an integral part of teaching but are too often superimposed on the normal work load not only of teachers but of pupils. The tests do not assess progress in the curriculum, nor do they diagnose the problems of any individual child. On that basis, I agree with teachers, and many parents and governors, that this year's tests should not go ahead.

Mr. Jack Thompson (Wansbeck): There is one further element to take into account. Some local education authorities, including mine in Northumberland, operate a three-tier system, which is seriously affected by the structure of the national curriculum, especially by the testing procedures. Children leave the middle school at 13 and will have been in the high school less than one year when they are tested.

Mrs. Taylor: My hon. Friend makes a valid point, which was discussed at some length when the original proposals were made. The present key stage ages cause difficulties for children who transfer through the middle school system. In general terms, however, I support the idea of some form of testing at 14, because I consider that an appropriate stage at which to assess a child's progress. None the less, I appreciate the problems that my hon. Friend raises concerning children in middle schools.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North) rose——

Mrs. Taylor: I shall give way once more, and then I must make some progress.

Mr. Greenway: Does the hon. Lady acknowledge that, in 1979, one in 13 children went into higher education, whereas a year or two from now, one in three will do so? Does she not accept that that means that standards must be raised, and is not a properly tested sound curriculum the way in which to do that? What would she do?

Mrs. Taylor: The hon. Gentleman ought to reflect on what his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said recently about international comparisons. I also suggest that he considers the importance of GCSEs in terms of raising standards, and especially in increasing motivation among young people. The GCSE is one of the reforms of the former Conservative Government that I support, and I welcome its impact. I therefore very much regret that the present Secretary of State seems to be undermining the very aspects of GCSEs that are most important.

Mr. Richards: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Taylor: I will give way for the final time, for the moment, to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Richards: The hon. Lady says that she agrees with teachers that the tests should not go ahead. Does that mean that she supports the boycott?

Mrs. Taylor: How many times must I say it? I certainly support the professional and educational case that teachers are making. Their actions in pursuit of that case are and must be their decisions—[Interruption.] I do not intend to tell teachers what to do; one of the reasons that we are now in this situation is precisely because the Government spend too much time telling teachers what to do and refusing to respect them or to listen to their professional judgment.

I will not tell teachers what to do, but I am happy to tell the Secretary of State what he should do, because the responsibility for the overloaded and over-prescriptive curriculum rests with him, not with teachers. The responsibility for the inappropriate nature of the tests rests with the Secretary of State, not with teachers. But the responsibility for protecting the education of our children during this clearly rests with teachers, because the Secretary of State refuses to follow the logic of his own conclusions and call off those clearly flawed tests.

The Secretary of State has said that these tests are the way in which to identify problems and that they have a diagnostic function. They are supposed to let parents know of their child's progress. Standard assessment tasks simply do not do that very well at all. The Secretary of State is a simple chap. For him, any test is good; any criticism of any test has to be wrong.

Lady Olga Maitland (Sutton and Cheam): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Taylor: No.

Indeed, it seems that the Secretary of State does not know his assessment from his elbow when it comes to testing. All he can do is repeat ad nauseam that anyone who criticises his tests is against testing and against raising standards. In fact, the opposite is true. Those opposed to his tests are in favour of good, useful methods of assessment as a means of raising standards, and are not in favour of tests that damage children's education.

If the Secretary of State ever bothered to read the research, he would know that standards are raised wherever good and appropriate tests are used, and that the information generated by those tests is used in the classroom every day by teachers and pupils alike as a basis for their testing and learning strategies.

Dame Angela Rumbold (Mitcham and Morden): I have listened very carefully to the hon. Lady's reasoning. The tests that she is discussing were originally devised by teachers and by the educational world simply to do the task of diagnostic testing and of looking into the abilities of children. Many Conservatives wanted to introduce a fairly simple pencil and paper test. We were told by many people in the education world, including some teachers, that that was quite impossible because it would be damaging. Could the hon. Lady tell the House what her tests would be?

Mrs. Taylor: Yes, I can. I have explained it in the motion which we have tabled. Conservative Members do not seem to be capable or reading the motion. I wish that they had done their homework before the debate. I should like to see introduced the model which exists in Scotland. It is the model which the right hon. Member for Mitcham and Morden (Dame A. Rumbold)—she should know better, because she was a Minister in the Department—must approve for her colleagues who introduced it in Scotland.

The Secretary of State has united parents and the education world against bad tests, not against testing itself. The right hon. Member for Mitcham and Morden asked about the different tests. Perhaps I need to give Conservative Members an education. I thought that someone who had been a Minister in the Department would have known the difference between, for example, summative tests and informative tests. The latter diagnose not only the fact that the problem exists but the nature of it.

I know that the Secretary of State would want parents to know not simply what their child could read but whether there was any problem as a result of a lack of comprehension, a limited vocabulary or some problem with word order. Good and appropriate testing which gives teachers and parents such information is essential to teaching. It is absolutely essential if we are to make the best use of our valuable resources, especially the time of teachers.

Dame Angela Rumbold: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Taylor: No. Poor tests such as those suggested by the Secretary of State waste that valuable teaching resource and therefore detract from the opportunities of our children.

As a parent, I do not want to know simply how my children are getting on. I do not want a frozen picture at any one point: I want to know what difficulties or problems they may have and what can be done to help them to do better.

The hon. Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim) asked what I thought parents should do. My daughter went through the key stage 1 standard assessment tests in the pilot year. At that time, I did not withdraw my daughter from those tests because they were new. Although I had reservations, I felt that that would not be the right thing to do. However, speaking from the experience of that occasion, I can say that the results of those standard assessment tests told the teacher nothing that she did not already know, and they told me nothing that I did not already know. The tests deprived my daughter and her classmates of the valuable teaching time of the teacher when the teacher was undertaking the test with all the other 30 children in the classroom over several weeks.

The key problem with the Secretary of State's tests is that they are high on administration and low on educational value.

Dr. Robert Spink (Castle Point): Is the hon. Lady aware that the pilot tests were diagnostic, in that they showed that, of the 14-year-olds who took them in English, three out of 10 had a reading age of between nine and 11 years? In that way, the tests were extremely helpful. Would the hon. Lady deny teachers the ability to diagnose the problem that those children have and to assist them to repair it?

Mrs. Taylor: I hope that someone on the Conservative Bench will explain a diagnostic test to the hon. Gentleman because it is certainly not what he is talking about. The hon. Gentleman is also wrong to say that the English standard assessment tests for 14-year-olds were on trial last year. Those tests were dumped by the Secretary of State. One of the reasons why we have so many difficulties at present is that the Secretary of State chose to change the examining body in midstream, yet again.

Conservative Members seem to think that only Labour Members are against the tests. I shall remind the House who is against the Secretary of State, because it is an impressive alliance, not an army of Luddites or neanderthals—the Secretary of State often uses such titles. For example, the Independent Girls Schools Association is against the tests. The president of that association was described as "ridiculous" by Baroness Blatch when she quietly expressed her misgivings about key stage 3 as long ago as November 1992.

Joan Clanchy, a head who was a member of the National Curriculum Council, resigned earlier this year, in her words because "the dominant aim had become a curriculum designed for tests, a model which is barren and intellectual."

She is not a member of the Labour party. In an article in this week's The Independent, she said that, as a council member, she objected to

"being given Centre for Policy Studies pamphlets to read by way of homework."

That is the tone of what was happening at that time.

Mr. Patrick Thompson (Norwich, North): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Taylor: Not at this stage.

Most of the independent schools say that they will use their discretion and will not introduce the tests for 14 year-olds this year. It is different for them. They have made their professional judgment and, by and large, they do not want anything to do with the tests.

The Chairman of the House of Commons Education Select Committee has called for a postponement of the tests. I am sure that he will explain his position later. Teachers from schools throughout Britain, who describe themselves as "anything other than loonie lefties"——

Lady Olga Maitland: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Taylor: No. I must continue to talk about those who are not loonie lefties and whose credentials the hon. Lady might appreciate. I have received a letter from someone who describes herself as a member of MENSA, and someone whose children were educated entirely at traditional prep and public schools and has been vice-chair of the Birmingham Conservative advisory committee.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): Not a member of the Labour party, then.

Mrs. Taylor: No, not a member of the Labour party. She described herself as "no trendy radical". She has said:

"Having wasted many hours on trying to determine exactly what is being required from teachers in terms of futile, punitive, pedantic, impossible-to-complete-honestly record-keeping, I have reached the conclusion that the demands of Key Stage 3 for the proliferation of bumf is a sort of mental equivalent to that emblem of certain Victorian values: the treadmill. Both inventions are designed to break the victim's spirit and exhaust her energies by a form of hard labour distinguished not only for its cruelty but also for the complete absence of any end product."

Lady Olga Maitland: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Taylor: I am sorry. I am quoting Conservative supporters. It would be well for Conservative Members to listen. [HON. MEMBERS: "Name them."] I will certainly send copies of the letters. I was quoting Alma Evers, who teaches at King Edward VI school in Handsworth, Birmingham, a school which may be familiar to some Conservative Members.

Lady Olga Maitland: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. The hon. Lady has made it clear that she will not give way.

Mrs. Taylor: If I am to make progress, I cannot give way too many more times. But perhaps I should point out to Conservative Members that level 1 of key stage 1 recommends that pupils should listen attentively to others. [Interruption.] I can go on to quote levels 2 and 3, which tell pupils to listen carefully. But we shall leave that for the moment.

Another correspondent describes himself as a member of the Conservative party. He has also written to the Secretary of State. He says that he has been a member of the Conservative party since 1976, and adds:

"Decisions are simply being dumped on schools for teachers to try and sort out and make some sense of for their pupils."

This is the type of information and response that we are receiving to the Secretary of State's proposals from up and down the country.

Mr. Eric Pickles (Brentwood and Ongar): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Taylor: No. I have quoted correspondence, and I am sure that many Conservative Members have been given similar information.

Mr. Pickles: Will the hon. Lady give way on this point?

Mrs. Taylor: I do not want to quote the document again, but I will send the hon. Gentleman a copy if he cannot listen carefully. It is for seven-year-olds. Perhaps Conservative Members could listen on that basis.

If the Secretary of State wishes to continue to call everybody who disagrees with him a neanderthal and to describe teachers as Luddites, perhaps he ought to take into account the fact that I have been quoting members of the Conservative party, independent girls schools and public schools—those who know what the situation is and are united in their opposition to these tests.

The Secretary of State may wish to dismiss all those people, but he must take into account the views of parents. The National Confederation of Parent Teacher Associations is against it; it agrees with us that the Scottish model should be introduced in this country. I know that the right hon. Gentleman the Minister has listened to some of those who are supporters of his party and who have told him that the tests are ridiculously flawed.

Lord Skidelsky has described the testing system as Byzantine. Donald Naismith, the director of education in Wandsworth—quite a topical place at the moment—has said:

"What we have now is not what was intended. Chickens are coming home to roost. . . . It is over-bureaucratic and unworkable. The sooner it is buried, the better."

And, as I say, more hon. Members opposite are now coming out in the same way.

Sir Paul Beresford (Croydon, Central): Is the hon. Lady also aware—I am speaking both as a Member for Croydon, Central, where that gentleman was a director, and as a Wandsworth councillor—that he still feels that these tests should go ahead this year as part of the review?

Mrs. Taylor: I am quoting what the director has said, not in private, but publicly—that the sooner they are buried, the better. I think that is good enough grounds for not making guinea pigs of our children yet again.

I will give an example of the kind of gibberish that is being sent out to teachers at the present time. The Secretary of State has sent out a circular about arrangements for testing this year, which says:

"For PC3 (Writing): First examine the constituent AT levels based on the NC Test levels and the TA level in the case of AT4/5: If the TA in AT4/5 (Presentation) is at level 7 and the NC Test level for AT3 (Writing) is at level 8, then the PC level is the AT3 NC Test level."

I am sure that hon. Gentlemen have every confidence in their ability to explain that to parents of children in the schools in their constituencies. [HON. MEMBERS: "Give way."] Of course I will give way to the Secretary of State, if he wishes to intervene to add extra clarity. Here we have yet again the Secretary of State turning to his junior Minister and asking for an explanation. Perhaps, if he had been on the Committee on the Education Bill, he would know more about some of these things.

All those who are opposed to the tests agree on many aspects. The first is that the tests are too prescriptive, too long and not properly prepared and piloted; that they are immensely bureaucratic and the administration is far too complex; and that teachers spend hours testing and recording when they should be teaching.

We believe that teaching time is especially critical for pupils aged 13 when they start to prepare for GCSE. These tests are a poor preparation for GCSE and are inferior to many of the tests that schools are already using. These tests, far from raising standards, have a damaging effect on children's learning, as teachers have less time to teach, and when they do teach, they are teaching to the test.

Perhaps, if he will not change his mind today and is intent on insisting that these tests go ahead, the Secretary of State would like to let parents have more say in what should happen. The Secretary of State says that he sets great store by the attitudes and views of parents, and he is very keen on ballots. May I suggest that he should encourage schools to ballot parents on testing? After all, we are talking about the future of their children. What is wrong with that? I hope the hon. Gentleman will support that suggestion.

Mr. Tracey: I speak as a parent of four children who have been through the state system. Will the hon. Lady take note that Ofsted said that the national curriculum and testing have driven up the standard of education? That is precisely what Conservative Members wanted and precisely the purpose of the Education Reform Act 1988 and the national curriculum and testing. Why did she not mention that when she was reading out her press cuttings?

Mrs. Taylor: The hon. Gentleman is lucky that his children have been through the system and are not being used as guinea pigs now. The Ofsted report said that the information and the results were very mixed. It was the Secretary of State who, yet again, put out a press release saying that everything was wonderful.

I return to my suggestion for a ballot of parents. I know that some schools are embarking on that course of action. I hope that the Secretary of State agrees that schools are entitled to do that, and that we should encourage greater parental involvement in that way. However, I have to tell him that the results of ballots that I have heard about have always shown that the tests should not go ahead.

We are asking only that the interests of our children should come first. The Secretary of State has admitted that the tests are flawed, first when he said that they would not be nationally reported and later when he accepted the need for a full review of the curriculum and testing arrangements. I hope that the Secretary of State will stop, think again and withdraw the tests.

This year's 14-year-olds could be the only ones that the Secretary of State is trying to get to take the tests. Last year's 14-year-olds did not, and by next year we may have a more sensible arrangement as a result of the review. Why should we make this year's 14-year-olds the guinea pigs?

The Secretary of State said that the tests should go ahead to help design future tests. In other words, the flawed tests should go ahead to find out just how flawed they are. I repeat that parents are absolutely fed up with their children being used as guinea pigs in the Secretary of State's experiments. It is change for change's sake.

The Secretary of State should follow the logic of his own conclusions. He has accepted that the tests are flawed and that there is need for review. He should therefore withdraw the compulsion for this year's tests and allow a proper and independent review.

I want to say a word about the review. At the Association of Teachers and Lecturers conference in Cardiff, the Secretary of State spoke about the membership of the School Curriculum and Assessment Authority. He announced, as if it were a great concession, that there would be one head teacher and one classroom teacher on the review body. Leaving aside the problem of who chooses the head teacher and the classroom teacher, that is hardly likely to win the confidence of the teaching profession. If SCAA is to gain the confidence of parents, governors and teachers—and I very much hope that it does—it is essential that it is not packed in the way that so many previous bodies were.

I hope that the Secretary of State will learn something from his colleagues in government. Ministers in the Northern Ireland Office have decided to delay statutory testing at least for a year. Ministers could follow the Scottish model and learn something from what has happened north of the border. Opposition to the nature of the tests in Scotland resulted in extensive consultation with parents and teachers. Most of the objections have been overcome because of those discussions and the fact that the issues have been talked through. In Scotland, there is no central collection or publication of test results. They are reported to parents and school boards. [HON. MEMBERS: "Disgraceful".] Hon. Members may say "Disgraceful," but their Government introduced the proposals.

Teachers in Scotland are trusted to judge when a pupil is ready to take the test and move from one stage of the curriculum to the next. Tests are informal and taken in small groups at all ages. Schools choose the tests that they want to use. I hope that the Secretary of State can explain why Scottish parents and children have come off so much better, and why the Government listen to Scottish parents and teachers but will not listen to those in England and Wales.

At the moment, the Secretary of State seems intent on pressing ahead as if nothing was wrong. Despite announcing that there is to be an overall review, he has announced yet more changes in the national curriculum for English.

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Mid-Staffordshire): Hear, hear.

Mrs. Taylor: The hon. Gentleman ought to tell the Secretary of State to make up his mind: either to have an overall review and look at all the information, or to go on meddling all the way through. The Secretary of State must stop meddling, or he will make a nonsense of the review before it starts. I hope that he will give an assurance this afternoon that he will not pack the committee in the usual way.

I have concentrated most of my remarks on the curriculum and testing, because that is the area where the meddling of Ministers is causing the greatest concern among parents at the present time. There are, however, other areas of instability caused by Government policy which it would be wrong of me to ignore, so I will briefly mention nursery education, the problems associated with section 11 funding, and the youth service.

One problem that is clearly causing concern to many parents is the squeeze on nursery education as a result of Government cuts. Our concerns about the future of nursery education are made much greater by the attitude of the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Schools, who is supposed to be responsible for nursery provision. We believe that nursery education offers the best introduction to formal learning and social behaviour for our youngsters. Like many parents, I was keen for my children to have the benefit of nursery education at a time when they were developing rapidly, wanted external stimulation, and were keen to meet and mix with other children and learn new skills.

It was not only my instincts as a mother that gave me an interest in nursery education. Research in the United Kingdom, the rest of Europe and the United States shows that children who get the benefit of a nursery education perform better academically in later years. The report on SATs for seven-year-olds shows that those who had the benefit of a nursery education had a head start. Another benefit is the early identification of special needs, which can save money later. It has been estimated that £1 spent on nursery education can save £4 later in terms of savings on antisocial behaviour and, indeed, prison.

The anger and frustration of parents who know that their children could benefit from a nursery place but who are unable to obtain one is made more intense by the answer of the Minister to my parliamentary question on 30 March. I asked the Minister to confirm that parents who live in Labour-controlled county council areas have a three times greater chance of getting a nursery place for their children than those who live in a Conservative one—a point which, strangely enough, the Minister ignored and forgot to confirm. Perhaps he will confirm it today.

I also asked the Minister what he intended to do about Conservative-controlled councils who were not spending their standard spending assessment on nursery education as they should. I went on to ask him to agree that every three and four-year-old should have the right to the best start in education, which meant being able to take advantage of nursery provision. The Minister would not say that children should be entitled to that, and many outside the House will have noted with despair the fact that nursery provision will not improve so long as the Conservatives remain in office.

The Government are often keen on making international comparisons, but we are not told, for example, that in France, by the age of three, 96 per cent. of children are in state-provided nursery schools, ecoles maternelles. We in Britain should be aiming for that target, so enabling every three and four-year-old to have a chance of a place in nursery school. Parents want that——

Sir Paul Beresford rose——

Mrs. Taylor: I have given way once to the hon. Gentleman.

If the Minister is seriously interested in raising standards in the schools, he should persuade the Government to take one of the most important steps to that end, which is to spend more on pre-school provision.

Another crucial area in which chopping and changing by Ministers is bound to damage the quality of education concerns children from the new Commonwealth for whom English is a second language, whom the Government recognise need help but from whom they are withdrawing assistance. Last year, the Government made much of an announcement about section 11 money going to local authorities so that extra assistance could be given in schools to children for whom English is a second language.

Mr. Fabricant: Will the hon. Lady please precis her speech?

Mrs. Taylor: The hon. Gentleman may not like to hear me spell out the record of the Government, but he must learn to take it. Hopefully he will get a chance to speak in the debate. In the meantime, he must listen.

As I was saying, the Government were boasting last year that they were providing section 11 money to local authorities. That announcement and clear financial commitment enabled authorities to give contracts to teachers and language support workers. The money may not have been as much as those involved would have liked, but at least contracts were made and people thought they knew where they stood.

In November 1992, the Home Office issued a circular reneging on that agreement. That happened without warning or consultation, and despite the fact that contracts had been drawn up and teachers placed in schools—[Interruption.] If Conservative Members are interested in improving the quality of education, they shoult take more interest in the vital support that is necessary for many school children.

The shadow Home Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair), wrote to the Home Secretary on the subject, and at least he had the courtesy of a reply, and an acknowledgement that the Home Secretary valued

"the important work that has been, and continues to be, performed by teachers and others" supported by section 11 grants. He went on to say that he remained

"firmly committed to the need to tackle the causes of disadvantage" and he mentioned the lack of English as a prime example of that.

I wrote at the same time to the Secretary of State for Education asking for his opinion, not least because of the contradiction caused by his claim that more money was needed for reading recovery programmes. I was anxious to ask him then—so I ask him now—how much greater will be the need for reading recovery efforts if we do not have the maintenance of language support teachers in schools that need them. I did not receive a reply from the right hon. Gentleman, so I can only assume that he is not interested in the problems faced by those with English as their second language.

Mr. Pickles rose——

Mrs. Taylor: I will not give way again. I am nearing the end of my speech—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."]—and that response from Conservative Members will convince the hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles) that his hon. Friends would not be pleased if I gave way to him.

There are other areas of instability that should concern us. We hear much these days about increasing levels of truancy, the increasing problem of exclusions from school and the difficulties and cuts facing the youth service. At a time when there is probably greater social disintegration than we ever imagined, the Secretary of State must explain what he is doing to protect the youth service. With youngsters having many pressures on them to conform to a culture of violence and to disregard everyone but themselves, an absolute need exists for more investment to counter such problems. Yet Ministers are not fighting on behalf of the youth service, which could provide an alternative culture and support.

After 14 years of Conservative rule, too many children have far too many problems in their classrooms, and many of them are under-achieving, despite the claims of the Government. We are debating what happens in the classroom at a time when teachers have never been more alarmed about the implications of Government policies for the children they are teaching and for the hopes that parents have in the education system.

After 14 years of one experiment after another, there is a feeling of despair about whether the Conservatives will ever get anything right. The Secretary of State has announced a review. We hope that it will be used by the Government to make a fresh start. They must try to work with parents and teachers, and their first action should be to admit that their past policies have been wrong. We need the development of a new consensus for stability in education. The Labour party is willing to concentrate on that, because we believe in putting children first.

The Secretary of State for Education (Mr. John Patten): I beg to move, to leave out from 'House' to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

'welcomes the commitment of Her Majesty's Government to the National Curriculum and its associated regular tests; notes that the new independent inspectorate, the Office for Standards in Education (OFSTED), recently reported that the National Curriculum and regular tests were already helping to drive up standards in schools; believes that the progress made in the implementation of the Government's education reforms is due to the hard work and dedication of professional teachers and welcomes the review established by the Secretary of State for Education into the National Curriculum and testing; believes that a boycott of this summer's tests would disrupt children's education, cause unnecessary concern to parents and damage the professional standing of teachers; and looks forward to a definitive statement from Her Majesty's Opposition as to whether or not it supports a boycott of this summer's tests.'.

I relish the opportunity to affirm to the House yet again the Government's commitment to the better education of all our children, our commitment to the national curriculum, our commitment to the regular testing of children and our commitment to the reporting of results to parents. There should be nothing to hide in our schools. I confirm our commitment to the publication of more and better information about how different schools are performing.

Those are the firm principles on which many of our education reforms are based. They are principles from which Her Majesty's Government will not be deflected. I believe that those principles are in tune with the aspirations of the vast majority of parents and most of the nation's hard-working professional teachers, to whom hon. Members in all parts of the House are grateful for implementing the reforms so far, since the process of reform began in 1989, following the landmark Education Reform Act 1988 introduced by my right hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley (Mr. Baker), who is in his place this afternoon.

They are certainly principles which set us a long way apart from the Labour party, as the hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor) demonstrated graphically today. She had the opportunity to make a positive and constructive contribution to the current debate about the implementation of education reforms, but she blew it. She rehearsed blowing it this morning on the "Today" programme when my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Schools comprehensively demolished her arguments, getting us off to a good start over our breakfast eggs. The hon. Lady's rantings this afternoon showed that, despite 14 long years in opposition, the Labour party remains absolutely devoid of any credible alternative policy on education. That view is held by left-wing commentators in the New Statesman and Society and The Guardian as much as by my right hon. and hon. Friends. That is because the Labour party remains as out of touch as ever with the wishes of ordinary people for higher standards.

Mr. Bob Dunn (Dartford): The Secretary of State will have noticed that the hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor) did not answer a single question today. She has not done so in the past. Does my right hon. Friend know that the hon. Lady is a member of the Socialist Education Association? Is he also aware that that association has advised parents that they should keep their children at home on testing days? Will my right hon. Friend therefore invite the hon. Lady to answer the question that was put to her earlier and will he give her time to do so? [Interruption.] Perhaps the hon. Lady would do me the courtesy of listening, which she never does.

Mr. Patten: My hon. Friend is right. The hon. Lady is taking her orders from that organisation which is trying to stir up as much trouble as it can in the nation's classrooms. As she made clear in her answer to the intervention of my hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Riddick), she, like her hon. Friend the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), is in favour of strikes, of industrial action and certainly of boycotting, as she has made clear to the House this afternoon.

Mrs. Ann Taylor: I thank the hon. Member for Dartford (Mr. Dunn) for reminding me that I have not paid my subscription to the SEA for some time, but I shall do so forthwith. On the point that the Secretary of State has just made, I hope that he will withdraw the word "strike", because I do not know of any teacher who is suggesting strike action on the issue.

Mr. Patten: I was simply comparing the hon. Lady's approach—[HON. MEMBERS: "Withdraw."]—to the approach of the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East, who supports strike action by the railways. There is nothing for me to withdraw. The hon. Lady has avoided the question yet again—wriggle, wriggle, wriggle. It is easy in the heat of the hon. Lady's earlier rantings to forget about the endemic feebleness of Labour. I am grateful to the hon. Lady for providing the opportunity for a serious debate at least in the second half of the afternoon because it is easy to lose sight of the background against which our reforms were introduced five years ago.

First, let me make it absolutely clear that, despite our differences with the leaders of some of the teaching unions, we have nothing but admiration for the overwhelming majority of teachers. They are hard-working and dedicated professionals who have risen magnificently to the challenges posed by the introduction of some of the most fundamental and far-reaching education reforms ever seen in Europe.

Lady Olga Maitland: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is a great insult for truly professional teachers to hear members at the conference of the National Union of Teachers making such statements as "This isn't the end of the campaign. It's the beginning—a springboard to fight the Tories on all the other issues."?

In other words, it is an attempt to politicise at the expense of children.

Mr. Patten: We all know that the agenda of bodies such as the National Union of Teachers is to use proper professional debate over curriculum and testing reform as an opportunity to begin an attack not only on issues which concern some teachers, but on the nature, rate and pace of education reform, because they do not like the way in which we have begun to expose the serious problems with educational standards in some schools in some parts of the country. I am determined not to hide that and I tell my hon. Friend that I will not hide it.

Mr. John Sykes (Scarborough): Has my right hon. Friend seen an election leaflet which has been circulating in my constituency, produced by a teacher training college for three Opposition candidates? It contains six minor political points but also six major grammatical and spelling errors. Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is usual in the English language to start a sentence with a capital letter? Does he agree that there are two Ps in "support" and only two Cs in "economic"? Does he agree that "advocate" has a D in it? Is not it right that "reasonably" has two As? Finally, is not it time that people like——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. Too long.

Mr. Patten: It may have been too long, but it was a jolly good question as far as it got. My answers to the first six questions are yes, yes, yes, yes, yes and yes. I have seen the leaflet, circulated by the Liberal Democrat party in the Scarborough constituency and, mysteriously, printed by a teacher training college. That is an issue which I shall have to look into later.

Mr. Gerry Steinberg (City of Durham) rose——

Mr. Patten: Ah, the voice of the NUT on earth.

Mr. Steinberg: Will the Secretary of State spell for us the word "sincerely"? Apparently when he wrote to a school in Cleveland he failed to spell it correctly. Will he please spell it for us now?

Mr. Patten: S-i-n-c-e-r-e-l-y. I hope that that is the last spell check for this afternoon. I utterly refute any suggestion of spelling errors on the part of my Department at any stage.

If anyone is the parent of a bright child in this country, the chances are that that child will do well at school. Most bright children do. They always have done. We still need to do more to help the particularly gifted child, but at the upper end of the academic scale we have a record which is every bit as good, if not better, as any of the advanced industrial nations which are our competitors, whether in Europe, on the Pacific rim or in north America. It is a record of which schools, further education colleges and universities can rightly be proud. The new vocational qualifications that are being introduced are helping to give new opportunities to those in the middle ability range as well.

It is at the other end of the scale—the 30 per cent. of the less able—that we do particularly badly. That tail of under-performance has been there for decades. The problem started back in the 1960s. It puts us at a distinct competitive disadvantage with our competitors. More importantly, it blights the prospects of many of our young people and it causes unnecessary unhappiness and a lack of personal fulfilment.

It is to those children that our reforms will bring most benefit whereas the reforms of the 1960s and the 1970s only did harm and lasting damage to a generation of children. We cannot ignore reality.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South) rose——

Mr. Patten: I will give way in a moment because I know the hon. Gentleman was a teacher and I respect his views. We have to confront the problem and we have to tackle it. Our reforms can, and will, put a halt to the years since the 1960s of under-performance and under-achievement of the three and sometimes four out of 10 children who, after 11 years of being taught, still leave school grappling with the English language.

Mr. Spearing: In 13 years in the classroom I spent much time dealing with the very problems which the Secretary of State is describing. I believed in testing regularly and was an Ordinary level examiner. Can the Secretary of State tell me, because of his professional background, whether he believes in the efficacy of field work? If so, can he tell the House which secondary schools he has been to, where he has perhaps sat down for a couple of hours with the staff and talked about the efficacy of the mechanisms which he is imposing upon them? Can he also tell us what the teachers have said to him? Can he give us the name of such a school and say whether it was independent or private?

Mr. Patten: In our first 12 months at the Department for Education, my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Schools and I visited more than 110 schools in this country. The list of schools is recorded in Hansard —as I answered a question on the subject just before Easter—to which the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) should refer. My next visit to a school will take place tomorrow morning, when I am visiting a primary school in Chingford. I very much look forward to that visit. I am determined not to hide any of the problems in our schools as it does the Government no good at all to do so. For the sake of thousands of young people and the competitiveness of the economy, the reforms, which are vital to the national interest, will continue.

Let us consider the Labour party's view as set out by the hon. Member for Dewsbury in her speech. She made much of the need for stability and frequently used the "S" word. I shall translate from Labour speak into plain English the definition of stability. In Labour speak, stability equals complacency and inertia. In Opposition speak, stability is code for orderly management of decline and for abandoning the reforms in our schools. That is the hon. Lady's agenda; she wishes to abandon our education reforms, as do the National Union of Teachers and the National Association of Schoolmasters/Union of Women Teachers. Stability is a code for returning to the failed policies of the 1960s and 1970s, when high standards were subordinated, above all else, to the pursuit of equality, which did much harm to generations of children.

Mr. Derek Enright (Hemsworth) rose——

Mr. Patten: I shall give way later to a deputy head teacher.

Stability is code for returning the running of our schools to the producer interests and for putting up the shutters against the measurement and publication of a school's performance and letting parents and the local community know about it. Stability is code for denying parents choice and for concealing results.

Mr. Enright rose——

Mr. Patten: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman, but I hope that his intervention will be in English, not Latin like last time.

Mr. Enright: In view of the Secretary of State's comments about the NUT and the NAS/UWT, I merely wanted to ask what he thought of the decisions of the union to which I am proud to belong, the LTA—[Interruption.] Sorry, the ATL—[Laughter.]

Mr. Patten: The hon. Gentleman cannot even remember the name of his own union. What is the modern Labour party coming to? The deputy headmaster should go to the back of the class.

Mr. Patrick Thompson rose——

Mr. Patten: Here is an ex-head teacher.

Mr. Thompson: An ex-classroom teacher who is proud of that fact. I know that my right hon. Friend supports good classroom teaching. Many classroom teachers are opposed to a boycott as the best means of proceeding. What does my right hon. Friend say to the hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor) and her hon. Friends who are failing to support those moderate and responsible teachers who believe that a boycott is not the best way of obtaining change in the national curriculum?

Mr. Patten: The hon. Member for Dewsbury is a boycotter and is in favour of industrial action in our classrooms—as parents are beginning to realise more and more. I tell my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Mr. Thompson), who is a distinguished classroom teacher, that I have received many letters from individual teachers who take a completely different view about boycotting tests from that which the hon. Lady attempted to put to the House.

I have a letter dated 12 April from a woman teacher of 19 years' standing from Ilford—[Interruption.] The Opposition should listen to and respect the views of a member of the teaching profession, not jeer at them. How dare Opposition Members jeer at a practising teacher—it shows the contempt that they have for teachers. The teacher wrote:

"I welcomed the advent of the national curriculum. None of us is infallible; and it gave me the confidence to know I was not omitting anything vital in my planning. It also gave structure and continuity . . . I am now discovering how my children have progressed and how ably they are acquitting themselves under test conditions. They have enjoyed their assessment tasks . . . and the results have pinpointed strengths and weaknesses in each individual which may not necessarily have been picked up in less specific testing. The SATS workload is demanding . . . However, the exercise is proving worthwhile.

I am aware that many teachers share my feeling."

The views of that classroom teacher are much more typical of the comments that parents want to hear than are some of the scenes that we saw on our television screens over the Easter period.

The hon. Lady's speech was a clarion call to duck the issues and desert the nation's children. Today we have heard the authentic voice of Labour after 14 years in the Opposition wilderness. The Labour party is fleeing, with full speed, back to the past. It summons us back to toleration of mediocrity and a blissful unawareness of what is being achieved in our schools. The Labour party's message to parents, the community and the taxpayer is that as long as there is no sound and publicly available information about standards, and no information on rigorous and manageable tests, everything will be all right.

Mr. Anthony Coombs (Wyre Forest): My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State mentioned the Labour party's record on mediocrity. May I remind the House of Labour's mediocre record on rewarding teachers and attracting them to the profession? Under the Conservative Government, teachers' wages have risen almost two and a half times faster than they did under the last Labour Government and in the past three years the average classroom teacher has seen his wages increased from £15,000 to £20,000 a year—a record rise. This year, 32,000 people want to enter the teaching profession—the best record in the country for 30 years.

Mr. Patten: Since I have become Secretary of State, teaching has become an extremely appealing profession and people are entering it in record numbers. My hon. Friend the Member for Wyre Forest (Mr. Coombs) is right —since 1979, teachers have enjoyed an overall salary increase ahead of inflation of 46 per cent. I confirm what my hon. Friend said.

Mr. John McFall (Dumbarton): The Secretary of State has been talking about mediocre records. I could refer to the mediocre record of his predecessor, the right hon. Member for Mole Valley (Mr. Baker), on finding out the true state of the national curriculum. I consulted the book of Duncan Graham, the chief executive and chairman of the National Curriculum Council, which said in the second paragraph of page 21 that the right hon. Member for Mole Valley signed a letter that could have had fatal consequences for the national curriculum. The two had a furtive meeting in north Wales, where the right hon. Gentleman was running a half marathon. The right hon. Gentleman looked at the letter and asked Mr. Graham whether he had signed it because he could not believe it. Does not that show the incompetence of the previous Secretary of State? The neanderthals are not the parents and the teachers, but those running our education system, and that is why parents and teachers have no confidence in Education Ministers.

Mr. Patten: I think that educational historians and political historians will look back at the Education Reform Act 1988 of my right hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley as a bench mark in national achievement. My right hon. Friend deserves the thanks of all parents and children for what he did.

I do not think that I, as Secretary of State, should ever duck an issue. I do not believe that education policy is best made by insulating myself from reality or information on what is happening in schools, which is why I have gone on so many school visits. That is why I also believe that the Labour party's complacency is entirely misplaced. The National Institute of Economic and Social Research recently found that, although we spend a greater proportion of gross domestic product on state education than do Germany and Japan, the standards achieved by those in the lower to middle ability range is considerably lower than in France, Germany and Japan. The problem seems to date back to the 1960s. That was the problem that led my right hon. Friends the Members for Mole Valley and for Mitcham and Morden (Dame A. Rumbold) and their hon. Friends to set about the process of reform.

It is not nice to be presented with a report, as I was a few months ago, showing that of those entering further education colleges last year after 11 years of state schooling about one third lacked an adequate command of English to make a good fist of their courses. That is the problem that we face. That is why the national curriculum and testing are so important.

It is not acceptable that, before the introduction of the national curriculum and its associated tests from 1989 onwards, parents should have had no solid information about pupils' progress until they reached O-level, as it was then, at the age of 16. They had no comparable information. It is only recently that the Government have introduced proper standardised written reports for all parents, which I, as a parent, value very much. Parents had no opportunity to judge the performance of their children against the performance of other children in other schools in other parts of the country.

Mr. Stephen Byers (Wallsend): I am grateful to the Secretary of State for giving way to a non-classroom teacher. Will he depart briefly from his prepared speech and address the excellent suggestion made by my hon. Friend the Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor) that he should ballot parents on whether their children should be tested this summer? The right hon. Gentleman is keen to talk about parental involvement. Will he put that rhetoric into reality and allow parents to be balloted on the crucial aspect of testing this summer?

Mr. Patten: I rather thought that we put our views to the electorate a year ago in a ballot where we won a splendid victory. The national curriculum and its associated testing regime were part of that.

Parents in our main competitor countries in Europe or the Pacific rim would be scandalised not to be given such information about educational performance. Yet that is what the Labour party [illegible]. It is in the pockets of the producer interest. It does not wish to see standards. As the hon. Member for Dewsbury herself declared, she has been in the pocket of the producer interest for many years as a trade union adviser.

Mrs. Ann Taylor: Will the Secretary of State please pause and think again about his decision with regard to encouraging schools to ballot parents? I said earlier that, as a parent, I wanted a say in the education of my children. I know, as a parent, the information that I want from schools and the kind of assessment that is appropriate for my children. I think that other parents share my views and would welcome an opportunity to be consulted about the appropriateness of the tests.

Mr. Patten: The hon. Lady wishes the introduction of the national curriculum to be brought to a halt. She has made it clear that she does not wish to see national testing or school performance tables. It is right that parents should have available to them information about the performance of their children and the performance of their schools compared with others in the vicinity and elsewhere in the country. The national curriculum is central to that.

Mr. Byers rose——

Mr. Patten: I have given way once to the hon. Gentleman, who described himself as not being a classroom teacher. He showed himself to be little more than a barrack-room lawyer. I shall not give way to him again.

The national curriculum, for the first time, establishes clear and challenging targets for pupils of all ages and abilities in the key subjects of the curriculum. Only last week I published proposals for the streamlining of those targets in English. My proposals reduce the number of requirements of the national curriculum, but give them much greater precision. They spell out the requirement that pupils must acquire a working knowledge of standard English, grammar and vocabulary. The contempt that poured from the Labour party last week about the need for children to speak standard English beggared belief.

The proposals ensure that pupils have a good knowledge of our literary heritage. Under them, pupils will no longer be able to leave school without a sound grasp of the basics. They will no longer be able to leave school without having their sights and spirits raised by our greatest writers.

Such reforms are fundamental in other countries. The National Institute of Economic and Social Research, to which I have already referred, found that the common factor in the higher standards achieved in France, Germany and Japan was the national curriculum that those countries have had for many years. Now, thanks to this Government, we are challenging our pupils to fulfil their potential as well.

Ms Estelle Morris (Birmingham, Yardley): The Secretary of State has just talked about new orders for the English curriculum, which were announced last week. Will the tests that are to take place, or may take place, in schools this term test the curriculum that he announced last week or the curriculum that has been taught for the past three years? If the latter, shall we have a new set of tests to test the curriculum that the right hon. Gentleman has announced for next year? If so, what is all the fuss about tests for one year that will cease to exist because he has changed the curriculum and so will have to change the tests again?

Mr. Patten: The hon. Lady should be putting that question to the hon. Member for Dewsbury. Each year the syllabuses for A-levels and GCSE change and each year the tests for them change. The hon. Lady is not neanderthal, she is positively paleolithic in her knowledge of the testing regime at GCSE. I cannot go back further. I must look at my prehistory.

It is an absurd idea that we should set in concrete a national curriculum and its tests and never alter them in the light of experience over the years as knowledge is pushed forwards.

Ms Estelle Morris rose——

Mr. Patten: No, I shall not give way to the hon. Lady again. It was a great mistake for me to give way the last time.

The national tests are an intrinsic part of the national curriculum. There is no point setting targets if pupils' progress is not measured against them. That is obvious to everyone except the Opposition. The national tests introduced by the Government, which happen on only four occasions during a pupil's 11-year school history, at seven, 11, 14 and 16, provide vital information for teachers about their pupils' strengths and weaknesses. They enable parents to hold schools to account for their children's progress. That is a right of every parent. They also enable the taxpayer—the Chief Secretary to the Treasury was on the Front Bench earlier—to make his judgment. They certainly enable me as Secretary of State for Education to see what is happening to education. How could I justify education expenditure to the Treasury in the forthcoming public expenditure round without evidence of improving standards? We cannot have it both ways. We cannot ask for the bill to be paid without demonstrating that it is worth paying. That is a message to which the education world should listen carefully.

Tests are the key to raising standards and they are already doing so. The inspectors of the independent inspectorate, Ofsted, have found in their first two years of operation that the tests for seven-year-olds have improved those pupils' attainments while showing—this is a cause for considerable concern—that one out of every three seven-year-olds have serious problems in dealing with the English language and simple arithmetical tasks. If that has all been put right in the past, as the hon. Member for Dewsbury was saying, why have the independent tests exposed that and why has the inspectorate said that the tests have raised teachers' expectations? I pay great tribute to primary school teachers in Britain who work hard, but the inspectorate has said that expectations have been raised.

There are striking gains and it is unreasonable for some in the teachers' unions now to seek to mount an attack on tests which have already taken place and which are already raising standards in Britain. It is typical of the hon. Member for Dewsbury that she should give comfort to that attack by the unions, to join in and encourage industrial action. Like it or not, that is what boycotting is. It is industrial action. We cannot mess around with words. The hon. Lady is aiding and abetting industrial action, just like her hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East.

The tests were written by GCSE examiners and by experienced educationists and devised under the direction of the School Examinations and Assessment Council, which had six teachers and six lecturers among its membership. The subject groups were largely staffed by individual, working classroom teachers and head teachers.

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend): The Secretary of State mentioned working groups. Why, in the case of the English orders put out for consultation last week, did the right hon. Gentleman deliberately avoid the English working group and have the curriculum council itself produce the work?

Mr. Patten: Because I announced some time ago that to keep the national curriculum up to date, there would be a rolling, five-year review of all national curriculum subjects.

Knowledge moves on. It was not written down in a book the last time that Labour held power. Knowledge and interpretation advance. There are changes all the time. /Interruption./ Does my hon. Friend want me to give way?

Mr. Harry Greenway: I accept my right hon. Friend's invitation. I was simply excited by his remarks about the sheer dynamism of education—particularly in the way in which my right hon. Friend represents it. The Opposition should take this lesson: when education becomes static, standards collapse. That has always been Labour's problem in running schools or anything else.

Mr. Patten: My hon. Friend, who was a practising teacher, exposes the underlying fallacy in Labour's argument, which seems to be that a national curriculum should be written one day and remain exactly the same, not for years or decades, but for hundreds of years and never improved.

Mr. Pawsey: Written in tablets of stone.

Mr. Patten: My hon. Friend is right.

Last summer's science and maths tests for 14-year-olds were extremely successful. There was much debate and there were problems and concern about those tests—just as there were in respect of the tests for seven-year-olds when they were introduced in 1991. There were threats of boycotts then. Happily, they were withdrawn and the tests went ahead and were improved.

Exactly the same is true of last summer's mathematics and science tests. The inspectorate announced that it was extraordinary that not only were standards higher than it had expected, but that truancy levels plunged on the day that the tests were sat and children turned up in large numbers to take them. Ofsted's findings that the tests were well received and worked well are interesting. The fall in truancy shows that children enjoy being stretched—and it is a great mistake not to stretch and to challenge children.

Talk of boycotts is an absurd over-reaction to tests that have been much more carefully prepared over a longer period of time than the average GCSE new syllabus. It does no service to the reputation of the majority of hard-working teachers who have conscientiously implemented the national curriculum. I am glad to pay tribute again to their professionalism.

I do not believe that those committed and professional teachers will turn to their pupils this summer and say that a test required by law—and it is, under the Education Reform Act 1988—and for which a pupil aged 14 has been preparing for three years, should be torn up and tossed in the wastepaper bin. I do not believe either that those committed and professional teachers will look parents in the eye and tell them that they do not think that they will bother with the tests this year and will not give the evidence.

The hon. Member for Dewsbury wants that to happen. She made it clear that she is in favour of industrial action, boycott, and withdrawing co-operation. That is reinventing the 1970s. The hon. Lady's analysis is fundamentally flawed.

The sensible response to the genuine concerns of some teachers about the manageability of the existing curriculum and assessment arrangements—I say "some" because many other teachers have written to support our policy—is to feed those concerns into the review that I have asked Sir Ron Dearing, chairman-designate of the School Curriculum and Assessment Authority, to undertake.

That wide-ranging review will examine the curriculum and assessment framework in its totality—not just individual subjects. It will be taken forward urgently. Sir Ron has already spoken to head teachers, teachers and many organisations interested in education. Although head teachers, deputy head teachers and classroom teachers have a prime interest in education, so have many others. We are all concerned about state education—we are all shareholders in state education.

However, Sir Ron cannot make progress and identify ways of improving the current arrangements unless he has sound evidence. That involves this summer's tests going ahead—that is Sir Ron's opinion, not mine. I quote from the letter that Sir Ron wrote to me:

> I have to tell you that if I do not have information from tests this Summer, I am going to have difficulty in giving well-informed and convincing advice on what changes should be made to the testing arrangements."

Those are the words of someone of enormous distinction and a great independence of mind. In other words—in my words—a boycott would be self-defeating. It would damage children's education by depriving teachers, pupils and parents of important information about children's progress. A boycott would retard the evolution of the national curriculum and its testing arrangements and would undoubtedly rebound ultimately on public perception of the teachers themselves.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Blackpool, South): Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is important not only for pupils and parents to see the results of the tests but for employers, in order to ensure that British commerce and industry has the best products of our education system in future? Employers as well as pupils and parents want the tests to continue.

Mr. Patten: I listen carefully to employers and I am sure that the major employers' organisations will feed their views into the review, and rightly.

If a child's performance in mathematics or English is not checked at 14, that child may leave school at 16 with a low or poor GCSE performance, by which time it will be too late.

Ms Estelle Morris: It is already too late.

Mr. Patten: It is never too late. The hon. Lady is arguing, then, that nothing can be done for a child who is under-performing at 14. That is complete rubbish. A lot of help can be given in two years.

Mr. Cynog Dafis (Ceredigion and Pembroke, North): Is the Secretary of State under the illusion that the performance of pupils in mathematics and English at the age of 14 was not checked before the introduction of that examination?

Mr. Patten: The hon. Gentleman is on to a very good point. The evidence available from the inspectorate is one of the important things that we must look at. We must deliver to each child in England or Wales—my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for Wales and the Minister of State are in their places on the Government Front Bench and are listening to the hon. Gentleman—/Interruption./—in whichever part of England or Wales for which we are responsible. That means giving each child in England and Wales a chance in life—not a hit-or-miss chance over whether or not there is testing at a school in Wales or in the area in which I live.

The tests at ages 7 and 11 will therefore go ahead this summer. Just how self-defeating a boycott would be is well illustrated by the evolution of the tests for seven-year-olds. It is important to work through this example briefly. Since those tests were introduced in 1991, we have listened to teachers and streamlined the tests to meet their concerns.

I am told that the 1991 tests for seven-year-olds were problematical. They were modified and focused on the basics of reading, writing, spelling and arithmetic—and quite right, too. Ofsted reported that the 1992 tests were more manageable than the 1991 versions as a result.

The 1993 tests that are under way in schools throughout the country now are better still. It is perverse for some in the teacher unions to incite their members to boycott tests which those members have worked so hard over the past two years to establish. Those tests are fundamental to our reforms and will help to crystallise the standards that we expect our children to reach.

The review illustrates another facet of our reforms, which, although carefully thought out, have been implemented pragmatically since 1989 on the basis of experience. It was only in that year that the national curriculum began to be phased in; it will not be fully in place until 1997, nearly a decade later and not until 2001 will the first pupils who embarked on it as five-year-olds complete it as 16-year-olds. That is a very long time.

At each stage of the introduction of the testing and curricular arrangements, we have demonstrated our keenness to take the views of professional teachers into account. That is why the maths and science curriculum, and the first tests for seven-year-olds, were simplified. The way in which the School Examinations and Assessment Council has listened has provided a model, leading to an improvement in tests year after year. That is why I decided earlier this year that results should be included in performance tables only for the second year of their introduction nationally. Our record shows that we have taken careful notice of professional views.

I shall not go into all the many other matters mentioned by the hon. Member for Dewsbury, because I do not think that the House is in the right mood to debate the full range of education issues. Let me remind the hon. Lady, however, that the Education Bill—which she failed to mention—passed through the House of Commons undented by the Labour party, whose Front Bench was one of the weakest Opposition teams imaginable.

The education system—underpinned by the national curriculum, testing and the Education Bill, which is now in another place—will last well into the next century. It will be the basis of our over-achievement during the late 1990s, allowing us to catch up with our competitors on the Pacific rim, in Europe and in North America. The Government constantly seek to achieve a balance between preserving what is best in our education system and improving what is less good.

Our overriding aim is to improve standards, encourage diversity and increase the number of opportunities. The achievement of those aims—which the Opposition seem to have missed entirely—will mean continuing to take clear and concerted action to set higher standards by stretching children in the national curriculum. It will mean measuring pupils' progress by means of rigorous and manageable tests and securing the publication of results in school performance tables. In that way, we shall ensure that our education system is fit for the challenges that lie ahead in an increasingly competitive world and that our children are as well educated as any in the rest of the world.

5.32 pm

Mr. Gerry Steinberg (City of Durham): Thank you for calling me to speak in this important debate, Mr. Deputy Speaker. As it is my birthday, I am especially grateful.

As is customary, I declare my interest. I am one of the parliamentary consultants of the National Union of Teachers——

Mr. Patten: How much is the hon. Gentleman being paid?

Mr. Steinberg: That is between me and the National Union of Teachers. Let me record, however, that I fully support the action being taken by the NUT and other unions, which is backed by their members.

The Government's education policy is only one of the many policies that they have dreadfully mishandled. They are now universally mistrusted. None of their policies is more mistrusted than their education policy, and none of their spokesmen is more mistrusted than the Secretary of State for Education. What a way to run an education service! What a way to treat the country's children, parents and teachers!

During the Secretary of State's speech, the microphone went off for a moment. I fully expected the right hon. Gentleman to behave like the concert chairman of my local working men's club, and to say "Testing, testing" as he does before a performance. That is what I think of the right hon. Gentleman's ability.

We need stability in our schools, but all that we get from the Secretary of State are threats—threats that teachers may be fined if they boycott the tests; threats that school spending will be cut if teachers refuse to test pupils; threats that governors may be taken to court and personally surcharged if they sanction the boycotts. Even governors responsible for the running of our schools vehemently oppose the Government's reforms. Recently, the Northumberland School Governors Association wrote to me as follows:

> "Governors in Northumberland are opposed to tests currently being required by the government for children aged 7, 11, 14 and 16 . . . The Northumberland School Governors Association trusts its teachers to exercise their professional skills in assessing the academic progress of pupils in a sensitive and positive way. And they place reliance on the objectivity and standards of GCSE and 'A' level examinations as genuine measurements of schooling.
> In our view it is high time that ideology and rhetoric were banished from education. Parents and governors know what is needed for their children. And in Northumberland they have every confidence in their teachers to meet these needs."

It is a great pity that the Secretary of State has not the same confidence in his teachers.

If the Government cannot get away with threats, they use the courts to take legal action against teachers. They use their puppet and lackey, Wandsworth council, to try to force teachers to carry out flawed and damaging tests; and they lose in the courts. They use the tactic of division by virtually forcing schools to opt out of local education authority control. They are setting one school against another, and one local education authority against another. They show contempt for those whom they most need if our education system is to succeed; they show contempt for parents, whom the Secretary of State describes as neanderthal. The right hon. Gentleman shows his contempt for teachers by rewarding their increased work load and dedication with a pay award of 0·5 per cent. —a miserly halfpenny in the pound.

The Government constantly use patronage to implement their right-wing dogma. They appoint Tory poodles to key posts. The chairman of the National Curriculum Council is David Pascall, a Tory hack; the chairman of SEAC is Lord Griffiths, another Tory hack; its vice-chairman is Ms Lawlor's husband, yet another Tory hack. The Government use bribery to implement their opt-out policy, giving opted-out schools vast amounts of capital expenditure as a reward. This year grant-maintained schools have received a 300 per cent. increase in capital expenditure, while LEA schools have received a 10 per cent. increase. If that is not bribery, what is?

Lady Olga Maitland: If, as the hon. Gentleman implies, he does not approve of tests, how could he possibly discover that some children are falling behind in their literacy and numeracy skills? How, without tests, could we discover that one third of school leavers going into higher education have a reading age of only 14? Is not the hon. Gentleman aware that the lack of literacy and numeracy skills is costing British industry £5 billion a year in mistakes? Surely that justifies proper testing.

Mr. Steinberg: Can the hon. Lady quote the part of my speech in which I said that I opposed tests? I shall give her a copy after the debate, and, if she can find the place where I said that I opposed tests, I shall take her out to dinner. I have not said that I oppose tests; I said that I supported the boycotting of flawed tests by the NUT.

Ms Estelle Morris: Does my hon. Friend agree that it was good practice on the part of most secondary schools to give the new intake of 11-year-olds reading tests so that the reading age of every child was known and it was not necessary to wait until the children were 14 to discover that eight out of 10 had a reading age below their chronological age? It is a travesty of the truth to imply that teachers did not know that children were failing in some instances.

Mr. Steinberg: That is absolutely right. I was the head teacher of a school for 10 years and, before that, a deputy head teacher for three years. I tested the children in my care every year for 13 years. I kept the test records and let the parents know at the end of each year the results of the tests. That is not new. It is an absolute load of rubbish to say that I oppose testing. We have been doing it for years and years.

The Government were convinced that schools in Labour-controlled authorities would opt out of the system. This Secretary of State, and previous Secretaries of State, said, stupidly, that opting out would provide schools with the opportunity to escape from bad, socialist-controlled local education authorities. But what happened? By far the majority of schools opted out of Conservative local education authority control. That proves just how out of touch this Government are. If they cannot get away with threats and bribery, they use deceit. A previous Secretary of State—not the right hon. Member for Mole Valley (Mr. Baker) who, history will prove, was a far superior Secretary of State under the Tory Administration of the past 14 years than anyone else who has followed him in that post——

Mr. Kenneth Baker (Mole Valley): Will the hon. Gentleman repeat that?

Mr. Steinberg: I never thought that I would say this, but when the right hon. Member for Mole Valley was Secretary of State he proved to be probably the best Secretary of State for Education that the Tories have ever had. To be quite honest, to say that takes the biscuit.

The Government have used deceit. During the debate on the teachers' pay Bill, the previous Secretary of State said that we had to trust him. I would not trust him any more than I would trust a second hand car dealer. He said, though, "Trust me." During the proceedings on that Bill he said that he could not override the new teachers' pay review body. This Secretary of State has done that in his first year in office. He has given the teachers a 0.5 per cent. pay increase—absolutely disgraceful when one remembers that the Government tell us how much they respect teachers and value the work that they do. The Government show so much respect for teachers that they give them a halfpenny in the pound pay increase.

I hope that those teachers who were conned and duped by the Government into accepting the pay review body now realise what this Government's words mean. The result of these appalling deeds has led to extreme dissatisfaction and instability in our schools. It is not surprising that 1 million days have been lost through industrial action in our schools since 1971.

Lady Olga Maitland: Whose fault is that?

Mr. Steinberg: Which party was in power when those 1 million days were lost? Tory Administrations have forced teachers into taking industrial action. Through their incompetence, 1 million days have been lost through industrial action.

Mr. Dunn: May I put a question to the hon. Gentleman, whom I like and respect, as he knows. Does he know whether more children of blue collar workers are in universities today than in the 1920s?

Mr. Steinberg: I do not know the answer to that question, but I suspect that there are. God help us if there are not. Since the 1920s there have been Labour Governments who have improved opportunities for children. We introduced comprehensive education which allowed the kids of blue collar workers to obtain the qualifications that they needed to go to university.

Mr. Dunn: The hon. Gentleman misunderstood my question. There were more children from blue collar worker families going to university in the 1920s than there are today. That shows the failure, not the success, of the comprehensive system.

Mr. Steinberg: I really cannot believe that. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will show me the statistics later.

Mr. Dunn: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will take me out to supper.

Mr. Steinberg: I do not really fancy that, though I owe the ex-education Minister a great debt, for it was he who kept my school open when the local education authority wanted to shut it.

[Mr. Steinberg]

The Government have managed almost the impossible: to alienate and unite the whole of the teaching profession. To make matters worse, the Education Bill, which is now in the other place, has nothing to do with raising standards in education—only with right-wing dogma, to get rid of local education authorities and place education eventually in the private sector. Education is not in the private sector now, it is not selective now, but the Bill that is now in the other place will encourage it to become both.

It is already moving in that direction in Penrith where, needless to say, the Secretary of State appaluded and supported the actions of that school in becoming grant maintained and selective. Although it was absolutely appalling, the Secretary of State agreed with and accepted what happened. Teachers fear that the Bill which is going through the other place has only one objective: to obliterate local education authorities, thus causing further instability in our schools.

The Government have said nothing about the statutory role of the teaching profession in improving the quality of education. The absence of a commitment to working in partnership with teachers reveals how little understanding the Government have of schools, how they are run and how they can be improved. Consequently, there is disquiet throughout education. The Government's attitude is exactly the opposite: one of confrontation, particularly as regards testing.

I shall quote from a letter that was sent to the Secretary of State—I noticed that he did not refer to it in his speech today, but a copy of it was sent to me—by the heads of English departments in 42 comprehensive schools in County Durham. They wrote:

"As Heads of English in Comprehensive schools across County Durham, we want to make clear our anger and professional disquiet at the way the tests in English for 14-year-olds are being implemented. We also feel that parents of Year 9 pupils should know the chaotic fashion in which these tests have been introduced.

As responsible English departments, we had properly planned schemes of work in response to the National Curriculum when these pupils entered Year 7. It was necessary to plan a three-year course in order to ensure that all required activities were covered. The information on the tests, which only started to come through officially last term, has meant that we have had to abandon our plans in order to cover specified texts and prepare our pupils for a very narrow form of examination . . .

This type of testing was not mentioned when we started the course, and we have had little time to prepare pupils. We were also asked to allot pupils to tiers within the tests before we had seen any sample questions. Contrary to reports, the new form of tests have not been tried out—or only in a very small number of schools, and with pupils of the wrong age.

We are very disturbed by these changes which are preventing us from working as we have planned. We have acted professionally from the start, in accordance with all the requirements in the National Curriculum, yet these changes are being forced through in a most unprofessional way that will be damaging to all our pupils, and to the concept of good English teaching."

It is incredible that the Secretary of State can be so stubborn and arrogant: all the professionals are wrong and he is right. For the life of me, I cannot understand how anybody can be so stubborn.

I make it clear to Conservative Members, particularly to the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland), that teachers are not opposed to tests, and never have been. Tests are part of an array of means to determine children's needs. The tests that the Secretary of State wishes to impose are fundamentally flawed. They will not benefit children; they will damage them.

I had intended to quote from a letter that I received from Mrs. Granville, the head teacher of a Cleveland school, Huntcliffe comprehensive. It is, however, a long leter, so I shall not do so. Instead, I will get on with my speech.

As if matters were not bad enough, the English orders, which were the most popular part of the national curriculum, are to be changed. Most professionals believe that major changes are not needed, and changes have been rejected in Wales and in Scotland, but not in England. Not only do teachers in England and Wales still have to operate flawed assessment and testing arrangements, in contrast to those that have been agreed in Scotland, but children in England are now to have a retrograde curriculum in comparison to that offered to children in Wales and Scotland, whose teachers have been heeded. It is a pity that the Secretary of State cannot listen to teachers in this country as the Secretaries of State for Wales and for Scotland have listened to their teachers.

That decision will further undermine the morale of teachers in England. They are being told what to teach and how to teach it. A teacher from Droitwich, Mr. Martyn Copus, recently wrote to me saying:

"Like many teachers I welcomed the bulk of the national curriculum provisions and the delegation of school budgets, but foolishly I assumed we would have some years to implement and assess the impact of these measures. It is now clear that the Government has decided on purely ideological grounds that we have failed and is determined to pursue its own agenda without any concern for the professionals."

Teachers who supported the Government now feel that they have been duped. They feel bitter about the Government's actions.

The Secretary of State stumbles on regardless. In all his rantings I have never heard him once mention the need for extra resources. Instead of threatening to cut education budgets, he should fight for the bare minimum standards of resourcing for education, especially with regard to staffing levels linked to class sizes, to curricular needs, to nursery provision and to books and equipment. If standards are falling, the Government are solely to blame. After all, they have dictated education policy for the past 14 years. They have under-resourced education throughout those years, and now they are using the excuse of falling standards to implement their right-wing dogma.

During the previous Parliament the Select Committee on Education investigated supposed declining reading standards. We found no evidence to substantiate that claim, which was made by a Mr. Turner, an education psychologist. Now—surprise, surprise—he has been rewarded for his unreliable report with a job as a member of the School Examinations and Assessment Council's English Committee.

It is with great sadness that I must tell the House that the Tory Members of the Select Committee connived last week to prevent the Secretary of State from being brought back to the Committee——

Lady Olga Maitland: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Steinberg: No.

Last week the Tory Members of the Committee connived to prevent the Secretary of State from being made to return to the Committee and answer further questions on the most topical current education issue.

Lady Olga Maitland: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Malcolm Thornton (Crosby): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Steinberg: Yes.

Sir Malcolm Thornton rose——

Lady Olga Maitland: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way.

Mr. Steinberg: The hon. Lady should not be grateful, because I am not giving way to her.

Sir Malcolm Thornton: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. May I put the record straight for the House? Before the meeting of the Select Committee, and without reference to any of my colleagues on either side of the Committee, I made it clear through the Press Association that my view as Chairman—clearly it had yet to be endorsed by my colleagues—was that it would be inappropriate and unhelpful to have an inquiry at this stage. That is the precise position. There was some brief discussion and then we proceeded to other business. What Members may do when they consider such matters is entirely up to them, but I have told the House what happened.

Hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Steinberg: I shall certainly not withdraw. As far as I am concerned, the Tory members of the Committee connived to stop the Secretary of State returning to the Committee to answer questions. The cat was let out of the bag twice, once when a member of the Committee said that we should not call the Secretary of State back because we should not put any further pressure on him——

Lady Olga Maitland: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Steinberg: No. The other occasion was when the hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Sir P. Beresford) attended the meeting for the specific purpose of ensuring that the connivance was successful, then left and did not return.

Sir Paul Beresford: The hon. Gentleman is aware that he was in a minority of two, so connivance could hardly have taken place. The voice was rather weak on his side of the Committee. He should also recognise that what the Chairman of the Select Committee, my hon. Friend the Member for Crosby (Sir M. Thornton), said is absolutely true. The hon. Member for City of Durham (Mr. Steinberg) was so busy rushing off to tell the Press Association his version of events that it was suggested that I leave; because I had a chest infection at the time, which would have made it difficult for an interview to continue.

Mr. Steinberg rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It might help the House if we were to recognise that the statements referred to were apparently made in private during the Committee sitting, so there is no record of them. Perhaps we can move on.

Mr. Steinberg: If the Secretary of State is not prepared to come back to the Select Committee, he must be shell-shocked; he must be in a dreadful state if he is not prepared to come back to the Committee and discuss——

Mr. Pawsey: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it not the practice in this place that when allegations have been made and have been proved to be unfounded, as has just happened, those allegations are withdrawn?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All hon. Members are honourable; they will have listened to what has been said and they should all recognise the point that I made about the events having taken place in private session. Perhaps we can now move on to more substantive matters.

Mr. Steinberg: Since 1979 education has received a declining share of the gross national product, despite what the Government may say. Education's share has fallen from 5·5 per cent. to 4·6 per cent., and central Government spending on education is 30 per cent. lower in real terms than it was in 1979. Figures recently provided to me by the Library reveal that, because of that, education lost the equivalent of £1·5 billion last year.

There will be stability in our schools only when the ludicrous so-called reforms are halted, and schools are better resourced to meet the needs of the national curriculum. I fully support the vast majority of teachers and the action that they are taking over the dreadful tests.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before I call the next hon. Member, may I remind hon. Members that Madam Speaker has imposed a 10-minute restriction from 6 o'clock, so whoever is called next will be asked to resume his seat at 6.10.

5.56 pm

Mr. Kenneth Baker (Mole Valley): Before the hon. Member for City of Durham (Mr. Steinberg) got into a procedural spat at the end of his speech, he had some kind things to say about me; may I tell him that I have always believed his judgment to be perceptive and distinguished?

I heard the speech by the hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor), and I must tell her that I was disappointed by it. It reminded me of the speeches that I heard from the Labour Front Bench in 1986 and 1987. The Labour party has been in favour of the national curriculum. It did not vote against it during the passage of the Education Reform Act 1988, but Labour Members' attitude has always been one of hesitant support. They have always taken the line that they would like the national curriculum, but not just yet—a sort of secular version of St. Augustine. We have heard that line again from the hon. Member for Dewsbury.

I recognise that there is considerable consensus in the country about the need for the national curriculum.

Mrs. Ann Taylor rose——

Mr. Baker: I hope the hon. Lady will forgive me if I do not give way, because I am short of time, and she spoke for quite a long time. What I have said does not do her a disservice.

The more that one can cement an agreement across the House between the parties on the importance of the national curriculum and the need to consolidate it, the better. The debates that we have about the national curriculum are not now heard in France and Germany, for the simple reason that in those countries the national curriculum has lasted for decades. Bismarck started the national curriculum in Germany, and in France it started at the beginning of the century. It has ceased, as it should have done, to be a matter of debate or dispute between politicians. The hon. Member for Dewsbury said that, in the revision of the national curriculum, politicians should step aside, and I echo that sentiment. I shall deal with that subject in a moment.

I must chide the Labour party, because, for all sorts of reasons, it has always been hesitant about going ahead with the national curriculum. In yesterday's edition of The Times, I read that Mr. Pascall, the outgoing chairman of the National Curriculum Council, has said:

"The 1988 Reform Act is our best chance to ensure that our children receive the education they need."

He said that there should be no slowing up in its implementation.

The process of getting the national curriculum on to the statute book has been long. It started with a speech by Jim Callaghan at Ruskin college in 1976. It is a matter of record that the education establishment, including the then Secretary of State, formed up against him. The establishment said, "Keep out of our garden. The curriculum is ours. It is the secret garden of our profession, so don't intervene." It took almost 10 years before I could introduce a Bill establishing a national curriculum. From some teachers—not by any means the majority—and certainly from some in the education establishment there has been hostility to the concept of the national curriculum.

If one has a national curriculum, one has to have detail and standards. The whole reason for our introducing a national curriculum was that we were disappointed by the education standards in our country over many years. Employers complained to us about the literacy and numeracy of 16-year-olds. We discovered that there were 6 million people who could be described as functionally illiterate. That was a disgrace to a country as civilised as ours was—or should have been. The whole purpose of the national curriculum was to elevate the standard of education for all our children.

When we fashioned the national curriculum, I was determined that it should be broad and balanced. One school argued strongly just for the three subjects: mathematics, science and English. I believed that that was a Victorian, Gradgrind curriculum, and I wanted a broad and balanced curriculum which contained not only science, mathematics and English at its heart, but history, geography and technology—the jobs of tomorrow. Now every child has to take technology up to 16, so that decision was a revolution. We are very bad at languages. I wanted to ensure that every child took a language up to the age of 16. That is now secure. I also included the cultural subjects: art, music and sport. The children in our schools must experience the pleasure and joys of those subjects as well.

It took a great deal to get that curriculum established. The question asked was, "How can all that be fitted in?" Much of the argument was that we should not be so prescriptive, that we should be more relaxed about the curriculum. I felt that we had to be prescriptive.

On the problem of fitting all the subjects in, one of the things that I most regret about my time as Secretary of State for Education and Science is that I did not open up the argument for extending the teaching day. If one could have one more lesson of 40 minutes a day in schools, all the pressures on the national curriculum could be eased, as could the pressures brought about by testing. I should have had open negotiations with the teacher unions again.

In schools in England and Wales, children are taught by someone standing in front of a class and teaching them for about 24 hours a week. In Scotland, the figure is 27 hours a week. In 1960 in England, the figure was 30 hours a week. In Japan, it is now more than 30 hours a week, and in France and Germany, it is between 27 and 28 hours a week. Those figures refer to teaching time. We must consider the structure of the school day and the use of teachers' time to ensure that there is more teaching in the classroom. That means reopening the settlement which I reached with the teachers in 1986.

I now come to the current point of great concern. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said, there does not seem to be much dispute now about the mathematics and science curriculum. I remember the passionate debates when we had to fashion the mathematics curriculum. I thought that there would be no debate on mathematics. However, there were debates about whether there should be calculators, whether calculus should be taught to children under 16, and how the teaching of number was approached. Passions raged. Passions also raged on science. Should there be two or three sciences? Should we teach the old three sciences, which we all learned, of chemistry, physics and biology?

I knew that the passions would be greatest in English, and that is why I set up two committees, first under Sir John Kingman, to try to define what English was. I appointed Sir John Kingman because he was not an English scholar, but a distinguished scientist and engineer. I did not want him to get involved in the whole linguistic debate, the phonics debate and all the rest of it. His report was not very satisfactory, so I asked Professor Cox to fashion the first national curriculum. That was better, and it has formed the basis of the English curriculum since then.

I did not disguise from the world in those days the fact that I wanted a return to basics in English. The most important thing that one has to give our children today is a mastery of our language. Our language is one of the great enduring assets of our country, and it needs to be taught properly. That is why we went to great pains to try to establish a curriculum, and why the then old-fashioned concepts of punctuation, grammar and spelling were so important. Those matters are not a subject of debate in France. French children are taught to discuss the nature of the Franch language and French grammar; it is not so here.

I took the trouble to look at the document on English which came out only last week from the National Curriculum Council. It is a very good document, which is a development of the original English curriculum. It says sensible things about key stage 1 for children aged seven. It says:

"Communications. Pupils should be able to use accurate and simple vocabulary."

The document gives good examples on grammar. It says:

"Subject-verb agreement. 'We were late back from the trip' not 'We was late back from the trip.'"

Such documents help teachers, and I do not see why the teaching profession has anything against this document.

The document also deals with literature, which is very dear to my heart. It says of key stages 3 and 4:

"Response to literature. Discuss narrative techniques."

This is for 14 and 15-year-old children. It says:

"Discuss narrative techniques, character development, conflict, tension, and atmosphere in a novel or a play, for example"— it is not prescriptive—

"'A Tale of Two Cities' by Dickens or 'An Inspector Calls' by J. B. Priestley."

Studded throughout the document is a range of access to literature, which is sensible. The document says broadly that children should have read by the age of 16 or have had experience of——

Mr. Mike Hall (Warrington, South): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Baker: No; I hope that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me.

The document says that children should have read or have had experience of by the age of 16 two plays by Shakespeare, of five poets, one before 1900, and of works of fiction, one before 1900. The document is not prescriptive. I have heard some teachers say that it is narrowing and restrictive, but I do not believe that.

We never try to tell teachers how they should teach in classrooms. The national curriculum provides the essential framework, and I hope that my right hon. Friend will proceed with it.

I am glad that he has appointed Sir Ron Dearing, a distinguished public servant. I first came across him when he was chairman of the Post Office and I was Minister for Information Technology. I appointed Sir Ron Dearing to be the chairman of the Polytechnics Funding Council where he did an outstanding job. I am sure that he will do a very good job of looking at the national curriculum.

We never envisaged that the national curriculum should be set in tablets of stone for ever. As the hon. Member for Dewsbury said, it must be looked at from time to time and reviewed. That is sensible.

Part and parcel of the national curriculum are attainment levels, and part and parcel of those are tests. There has been much discussion about tests. I tried to have simple tests. I wanted pencil and paper tests, but the advice I received was that they had to be more complicated, so we set up an elaborate system which has become too complicated.

Now we want it to be simpler. However, I suspect that, when it becomes simpler, quite a few teachers will say that it is too simple and that they do not want to go back to pencil and paper tests. There is an element of pencil and paper in all tests.

The boycott is utterly wrong. I do not believe that teachers should take industrial action in any circumstances. I speak as a Secretary of State who had to deal with a strike that had lasted for three years. A strike or industrial action, whatever the semantics, in the classroom is wrong, because it sets a bad example to children. Teachers are people to whom children should look up, so I beg the various teaching unions not to proceed with the boycott.

When I was Secretary of State, I had to face a boycott of the GCSE, which was far more important than a boycott of the tests for 14-year-olds. If the GCSE had been boycotted, there would have been no certificates for a whole year, and we could not have caught up on that. I shamed the National Union of Teachers into abandoning its boycott, and I hope that the teacher unions will be shamed into abandoning their present boycott.

In 1989, at the north of England conference to which all Secretaries of State go from time to time——

Mr. Hall: This one did not go.

Mr. Baker: I said, "from time to time". I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will go in the fulness of time.

After the Education Reform Act 1988 was on the statute book, I said that the national curriculum should do five things:

"give a clear incentive for all schools to catch up with the best and the best will be challenged to do even better; provide teachers with detailed and precise objectives; provide parents with clear, accurate information; ensure continuity and progression from one year to another, from one school to another; help teachers concentrate on the task of getting the best possible results for each individual child."

That is the object of the national curriculum, and I believe that it has achieved it so far.

6.9 pm

Mr. Don Foster (Bath): The Secretary of State for Education began his speech by listing a number of firm principles which his party supports. Perhaps I shall surprise him and other Conservative Members by saying that I entirely agree with the principles of a national curriculum, the testing and assessment of that national curriculum and the provision of information to parents on the strengths and weaknesses of their children. It is easy to speak in slogans and headlines. This debate should be about the details that underpin those principles—the type of national curriculum, the type of testing and the type of information that should be provided to parents about those pupils.

In the few minutes available to me, I shall address my concerns about the approach to those matters. The Government's approach is leading to a crisis in our education service. That crisis is of the Government's making. They have created strife where once there was harmony. For decades since the Education Act 1944, an education partnership has built up in the United Kingdom among parents, teachers, governors, local education authorities, the local community and central Government. The Government's actions undermine that partnership and bring instability to the education system.

The Government's attacks on local education authorities and many within the education service, their abject failure to consult and their continuing lack of direction are leading to unprecedented and unnecessary chaos, division and strife, and a significant lowering of morale throughout the education service. They are interested only in forcing through their views—views which are the cause of much of the strife in the education service. The real disgrace is that they mask that behind the pretence of choice. In reality, the only choice is that there can be an education system of any colour, as long as it is Tory blue.

During the passage of the Education Bill, I proposed an amendment that would have allowed grant-maintained schools to opt out of that status and return to local education authority control. The Government refused to accept it.

Lady Olga Maitland: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Foster: If the hon. Lady will forgive me, I would prefer not to give way, because time is short.

The Government will accept the opportunity for people to vote only if they can be sure that the vote will go the way they want. That has been demonstrated today by their unwillingness to accede to the request of the hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor) and other hon. Members that there be an opportunity for parents to ballot on their thoughts about the current testing procedures.

The problem is the approach of the Secretary of State and his Ministers. Perhaps it is not surprising that the Department for Education, under this new Secretary of State, has moved into new premises which are aptly called Sanctuary buildings. When the Secretary of State is closeted in that sanctuary—as he frequently is—he is unwilling to listen to the vast majority of views of the people in the education service. He prefers to listen only to the views of those who share his views.

Occasionally, the Secretary of State emerges from the sanctuary bunker and sadly undermines, by the things he does and says, the education partnership. We have seen a number of examples—the rubbishing of last year's GCSE examination results, the debacle over the league tables, the way in which he called the views of some parents' organisations "neanderthal", and the constant and piecemeal changes to different aspects of the national curriculum and the associated assessment procedures.

We have now seen the disorder that has been caused by the proposed key stage 3 tests this summer. With all those statements, the Government still fail to get it right, and the nation sadly suffers as a result. It is no wonder that, only six months into the reign of the Secretary of State, a Conservative party document—referring to the Secretary of State—talked about too much fire and brimstone, ill-defined attacks on education experts and not enough attempts to raise morale in the education profession.

As the motion before the House says, there is an urgent need for stability in our schools. The Secretary of State is in a curious position. He is largely responsible for the malaise that we are in, but he is about the only person who is capable of treating it. He could treat the malaise today —although I suspect that he will not—by accepting the motion, especially the part that refers to the key stage 3 tests.

On the issue of testing, the right hon. Gentleman has built, ranged against him, a most amazingly powerful coalition of people interested in the future of education. He has managed to unite parents, governors, teachers, local education authorities, directors of education, Conservative party organisations and, indeed, many leading Conservative politicians in the belief that the current curriculum testing arrangements are unworkable, unmanageable and likely to harm the education of children.

Many people would agree that it was an absolutely singular triumph for the Secretary of State to unite the traditionally moderate Association of Teachers and Lecturers in their vote on the boycott of the tests. It has certainly been a singular triumph to have so many traditional Tory supporters opposed to the tests. Indeed, the list of those who claim that the whole process is like a juggernaut careering to disaster reads like a "Who's Who" of previous fans of the Tory party education reforms.

The hon. Member for Crosby (Sir M. Thornton) and the right hon. Member for Brent, North (Sir R. Boyson), who are in their places, have made highly critical comments. That traditional Tory party newspaper, The Daily Telegraph, suggested that the only way out of the Secretary of State's current dilemma was unilaterally to scrap this year's tests. Of course, there are many other people to whom the hon. Member for Dewsbury referred.

To the voices of those Conservatives must be added —as anyone who has looked through the press recently will know—the views of a vast number of parents who oppose the Secretary of State on the issue of testing. Many governors, local education authorities and chief education officers oppose it. Of course, a huge number of teachers oppose, from a professional view, the testing procedure proposed by the Secretary of State. Incidentally, I must congratulate the investigative talents of The Mail on Sunday which, this weekend, managed to dig up two teachers who support the Secretary of State. Apart from those two people, the Secretary of State stands almost alone, deserted even by his traditional allies. He cannot rely on the support of the independent school sector.

With so many voices ranged against him, one might have expected the Secretary of State to reflect on the advice offered by Oliver Cromwell to the Church of Scotland:

"I beseech you, in the bowels of Christ, think it possible that you may be mistaken."

Sadly, the Secretary of State is mistaken about many things. Most importantly, he is mistaken in his claims that the vast majority of teachers are opposed to testing and assessment.

Those teachers are definitely not opposed to testing and assessment. Indeed, a teacher union leader said to me only yesterday that teachers do not need some Johnny-come-lately Secretary of State telling them about testing and assessment. The vast majority of teachers agree not only with testing and assessment but with the importance of some external moderation with national testing as part of the development of the education process.

The real anxiety of the vast majority of those in the education service is with the particular testing regime imposed by the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State has told us today that it is vital that that testing procedure be continued as a way of developing the procedure. But no one who tests any product even begins the testing procedure with real people, especially pupils in our schools, when all the professionals say that it is flawed. Until there have been major reforms——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. I call Dame Angela Rumbold.

6.19 pm

Dame Angela Rumbold (Mitcham and Morden): Little would have persuaded me to join in an education debate at this time, because I believe passionately that, when one has had time on a subject as I have had time on education, one should perhaps leave a decent interval before one returns to it, especially from the Back Benches. However, several reasons have made me decide to join in.

One of the most pointed reasons is that I have normally managed to shut up the clarion voices of people on radio and television who carry on at one stage or another about the introduction of the national curriculum, testing and all the other reforms introduced in the Education Reform Act 1988 of my right hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley

(Mr. Baker). This time, I found it more difficult. The voices invaded my kitchen via the radio, and even invaded my television during the Easter weekend. I found that unforgivable, so I decided that I would say something about it.

The second, and much more serious and important, reason is that I felt strongly that I should state the principle of testing, which is critical to the national curriculum, the inception and implementation of which my right hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley so eloquently described. The essence and success of the national curriculum depends on the principle of testing and its implementation throughout our schools.

The third reason was my sheer enjoyment of the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley. I greatly enjoyed it, because it took me back to an extremely happy time when we were working together on the Education Reform Act 1988.

Many people on the Opposition Benches and in the country at large have asserted vigorously that they are, of course, in favour of testing. They say that they want to see children tested. Indeed, we are told by many teachers, who I believe are genuine, that they test their children regularly at every interval. However, that is not what we are talking about, and it is not what the national curriculum and the testing attached to it is about. Nor is the Education Reform Act 1988 about that.

Now, as in 1988, we are talking about the standardisation of tests at the ages of seven, 11, 14 and 16. We have not addressed that in the debate this afternoon. It is unfair to many good teachers throughout the country to pretend that testing by individual teachers of individual pupils at every point in their career in the classroom is the same thing as the standardisation of tests for seven, 11, 14 and 16-year-olds.

In our schools today, standard tests for seven-year-olds have been introduced. They were introduced over a period. I do not say that the early introduction of any of the testing was absolutely perfect. Indeed, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State explained clearly that the system is one of evolution. The introduction and implementation of anything as large as the Education Reform Act 1988 cannot be arranged in two or three years.

The Education Reform Act was a 10, 12, 15 or perhaps 20-year programme to ensure that, throughout our schools, standards were raised, practices were introduced and education was inexorably lifted, so that teachers who came into a classroom knew what they were expected to teach and test on, and children knew what those tests involved. More importantly than ever before, parents receive the information that they want.

The ambition of parents when their children are tested at school is to know two things. The first is how their child is doing. They do not want to be told, "He is doing nicely. You will find that he is integrating well into the class." They want to know whether he is keeping up with the sums, whether he can spell and whether his essays and little offerings are as good as those of the other children in the class.

The second thing that parents want to know is whether their child's school is as good as the school down the road. They want to know whether their child's class is as good as the class at the other school. They want to know where their child stands. Not only middle-class parents who live in houses with pianos and books but all parents instinctively want to know that. Many parents who may not be able to articulate that desire want that information. To deny them that information and say that it is not possible to say exactly and precisely how the child is doing is fundamentally wrong. It is a serious matter for the country to consider. That is why the boycott is so dangerous.

The boycott undermines the principle, which has taken some five years to establish in the country and in schools, that testing is important. I remind the House that it is not so long ago that we introduced another reform in the education system. In the same Education Act, and in my time as Minister of State, we introduced local management of schools. I travelled around the country talking to primary and secondary school teachers. They told me that it was impossible to introduce LMS, that it would involve far too much administration, that they were not administrators, and that they were there not to manage anything so crude as money or consider budgets but to teach. They said that they did not want to be taken out of the classroom to administer the school's budget and that LMS would be a disaster. That was only three years ago.

I defy any Opposition Member, parent governor or anyone anywhere in the country to say that they would prefer that we took LMS away. The majority of schools are 100 per cent. in favour of it. I draw a parallel with the introduction of testing. I simply say to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State that it may take longer for people to accept testing, but I know full well that his intention is right. It is entirely the rights of parents as well as children to have those tests introduced.

We are considering tests for 14-year-olds at present. My right hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley described eloquently and directly those wonderful days when we began to introduce English as a subject and to set up what one should or should not ask teachers to consider teaching children at various ages. Of course it is a controversial subject, and of course people will argue, but eventually they will come back to the basics, as I believe that Sir Ron Dearing will quickly do after this year's experiment and testing. It is extremely important that the tests continue.

We shall see the programme evolve and develop. I remind the House that this is 1993. In 1994, we shall introduce tests for 11-year-olds. I can imagine the language that will be used. The phrases are resonant. I can hear it all. People will say that it is all about the 11-plus and selection of children. That is nonsense—it is old education-speak. We are going forward now. We shall take our children forward.

Many of the excellent teachers out there will be reluctant to boycott education practice in the way that has been suggested to them by some of the more militant unions. They will take education forward with the tests to ensure that their children—for they are parents, too—our children, my grandchildren and all the children of Britain can achieve the standards we need in our schools and universities for our ideas to materialise and continue to be as good as they always have been, so that Britain can export brilliance and success.

If the boycotts go ahead, they will be a devastating blow to the introduction of many of the reforms which have succeeded, although with difficulty, so far. I wish this reform success, and I hope that the clarion voices will no longer be heard.

6.29 pm

Ms Estelle Morris (Birmingham, Yardley): It has been customary in this debate for hon. Members to declare their interest at the beginning of their speeches. I declare an interest as a consultant to the National Union of Teachers and as having spent 16 or 17 years teaching in an inner city multiracial school and community college.

Those of us who have visited schools in the last year can be in no doubt that this term schools are in crisis. It is clear that teacher morale is at rock bottom, that schools are continuously and increasingly under-resourced and that, as a result, children's education is suffering. Anyone would think from the flurry of media interest in education in the last few weeks that this was something new, but those of us who are interested in education know that this crisis has been growing for some time and that this dissatisfaction with what is going on in education has been around for some years.

There is a feeling among parents and teachers that those who currently exercise political control over what goes on in our schools are removed from the reality of classroom practice. I sometimes think that the utterances that come these days from Sanctuary buildings have more to do with the posturing of the Secretary of State than with raising standards of education for the children for whom we have a responsibility.

One of the Secretary of State's infamous predecessors was the "I know best; I do not need to listen" type. It has been one of the saddest things in the past year that the present Secretary of State seems to rate her higher than he does some of his better predecessors. Nowhere can that be seen better than in the chaos of what has gone on in key stage 3 English testing in the last year. A year ago, schools were busy teaching the national curriculum key stage 3 English. As recently as last September, the Government commissioned its third attempt to get an acceptable form of testing English at that point. The pilots that were published last autumn were radically different from the two that had preceded them. When they had finished, the response was unanimous: the tests were bad. The teachers, the governors, all those who had looked at the tests were unanimous: the tests were ill prepared, they were prescriptive, they lowered expectations of our pupils and, most important of all, they were not based on the national curriculum that had been taught in schools for the previous three years.

How can the teachers have been teaching the books on which the children are to be tested when it is now only four months since the book list was published?

I listened carefully to what the right hon. Member for Mole Valley (Mr. Baker) said. It was a sensitive speech and one that I enjoyed. He talked about a variety of literature. He talked with some feeling about books, choosing them and giving access to them to the whole range of children. That is not what is being said by the Secretary of State. He is saying "Thou shalt read this, that and the other book that I have chosen".

The right hon. Member for Mole Valley talked about Shakespeare and the other great writers of our history. The Secretary of State's testing will prevent children in the lower ability range from reading and learning about Shakespeare, when in many schools they have been doing that for the past decade. The right hon. Member for Mole Valley said that it was not for us to tell teachers how to teach, but the effect of the testing introduced by the Secretary of State is to forbid strategies that have enabled teachers to teach Shakespeare and other great writers successfully to children in a wide ability range.

What were the results of those pilot tests? No results were published, we never saw what the teacher response was, and the Secretary of State refused to enter into discussions with those who had been involved with the tests. Instead, he used the opportunity to demonstrate some sort of political strength, some sort of growing opposition to teacher unions, and what seemed at that time to be a total disregard for the work that teachers were doing in schools.

Key stage 3 English testing is not about who runs schools, it is not about left and right, it is certainly not about whether children should be tested. What the key stage 3 English debate is about is whether Ministers want to work with teachers and parents to get the best for our children, or to carry on making changes in spite of the opinions of those important groups.

In the last few months the Secretary of State has turned an educational discussion into a political wrestling match. For that he cannot and must not be forgiven. Through December, January, February and into March, all we heard from him was that the tests were scrupulous and unflawed; they were unparalleled in their distinction. He refused to publish the evaluation of the results and he refused to talk to people.

By April he was beginning to see the light. He called for a review; he talked of genuine concern among teachers. His conversion on the road to Cardiff was exceptionally welcome to me, for one. But he still did not have the political courage to withdraw the tests. He seems to have spent the Easter recess looking for excuses not to accept the logic of his own statement to the conference in Cardiff. He went to Cardiff, Brighton, Bournemouth and back to Brighton looking for anything to distract our attention from the real issue.

Any statement by any union leader that could be interpreted as a political attack on the Government was seized on by him as a way of not discussing the real issue, which was testing. When one union leader talked about a campaign against the Government, that was it; gold had been struck. Baroness Blatch was dispatched to "Newsnight" and John Patten's picture appeared in every newspaper.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. I know that the hon. Lady is among the last batch of hon. Members to come here and has probably not got used to our procedures. She must refer to the right hon. Member as the Secretary of State, not by his name.

Ms Morris: I apologise Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The same picture of the Secretary of State appeared in all the newspapers the next day. He was more intent on renewing his battle with the unions than on talking about testing.

Despite this, he has now said that the tests must go ahead, because he will not know how to improve the tests next year unless the pilot scheme is allowed to run this year. It is clear that the tests will go ahead this summer, not to test the children, but to test the tests. The children are being used as guinea pigs. There are pilots to test the tests, but nothing to test the children, because, as the Secretary of State has admitted, those tests are flawed.

The only people who seem to need the pilot tests to find out what is wrong with them are the Ministers on the Government Front Bench. Everybody else who has been involved in the tests knows what is wrong with them. Nobody needs to go through a pilot scheme this year to find out how they ought to be improved. We have an over-burdened curriculum and flawed tests piled on to an already creaking education system. For a decade now, financial cuts imposed on local authorities have meant that, as each academic year approaches and schools consider how to reorganise themselves, they tailor what goes on not to meet the needs of the pupils but to meet the demands of the Treasury.

We have seen special needs money siphoned off for other uses, fewer resources and larger classes. And piled on top of that is the greatest conflict and instability that has yet hit our schools—the balloting process over grant-maintained schools. It is a system designed to create conflict; a one-off opportunity for everybody to cast a vote to decide whether a local education authority should be allowed to continue to exist.

What would be lost by losing that battle is so important that all sides will play it for all it is worth. We have seen it happen already: bitter battles about ballots going on all over the country. The consequence of losing the ballot is great, because under the type of democracy introduced by the Secretary of State there is a one-off vote and one does not get another chance.

There are many areas of our education system at the moment in which there is instability: an unstable curriculum, an unstable testing system, an unstable structure imposed on us by the Government. Teachers need a structure that enables them to do their job, which is being in classrooms, raising the standards of education of our children and having the highest expectations of them. Under this Government, with the proposals that we have seen, we as politicians have not given them that. Let us take this opportunity to give them what they deserve.

Sir Rhodes Boyson (Brent, North): I shall refer simply to the national curriculum and testing.

It is a mystery that people feel that we never had a national curriculum before, but we did. My first job was as head of English in a secondary modern school in Lancashire. When I was appointed I went to the headmaster and drew up a syllabus and we put it into operation. A week later I was visited by an HMI, and in those days HMIs were very wise. He gave me a book called, "Handbook of Suggestions for Teachers", which came out in June 1944. It was first published in 1890. It comprised 564 pages telling teachers what to do in every year with the bright, average and least bright pupils.

In 1979, when I became a Minister in the Department of Education, no one knew that there had ever been a national curriculum. It had collapsed and disappeared.

There was also a book on primary education entitled,

"Suggestions for the Consideration of Teachers and Others Concerned with the Work of Primary Schools".

It was last reprinted in 1963.

It was not that we never had a national curriculum. Until the cultural revolution of the 1960s we had a national curriculum and we also had testing. The testing was the dreaded 11-plus over which so many Labour Members committed suicide. If any of them wish to do so tonight, it would be preferable if they did not do it in the Chamber.

Some 50 per cent. of children sat the 11-plus. [Interruption.] I failed mine; the hon. Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Mr. Miller) probably passed his and that is why he joined the Labour party. Children took the 11-plus in English, mathematics and general knowledge, which was scripture, geography, history and civics. I had the most homework in the year when I sat my 11-plus. I failed it because of Blackburn Rovers. I left the examination early to see them playing a cup match and I did not finish the last half hour. Blackburn Rovers are doing very well now, although it took them a long time to get there. I failed the 11-plus and that was the only time my father ever hit me from one end of the room to the other, and I decided from then on that education was very important. I have believed in corporal punishment ever since.

Let me say a word about the English tests and the teaching of standard English. Children should be taught standard English, otherwise they will be handicapped for life. In the yard they will still speak their own language and it is no good having a teacher in the yard to tell them how to speak when they are playing games, but they must be taught standard English, otherwise they will be handicapped if they want mobility nationally or in their chosen work.

In the 1960s we had the cultural revolution; the resurrection of Rousseau from France and Dewey from America by long distance telephone. It was said that every child should develop at his own pace. We had the Plowden report, which should be burnt in Trafalgar square as it did so much harm.

We all know that it is better to find out than to be taught, but how can children discover by accident at the local library the theorems of Euclid or Faraday's electromagnetic laws or even the French subjunctive without going on a day trip to Boulogne? They cannot. It is the teachers' job to pass on the learning of the ages. If children could do it for themselves, we could save all the money we spend on education and put them in libraries and the teachers could go somewhere else and dig trenches or the potato crop.

The national curriculum was destroyed as was the idea that teachers had a body of knowledge to pass on. Similarly, we had reading readiness or real books in primary schools. Very clever children will learn from those, but the others must have phonics and must be taught bit by bit. My hon. Friend the Member for Dartford (Mr. Dunn) referred to illiteracy. He did so with his usual great wisdom. I am godfather to his son, so he is obviously a very wise man.

Comprehensive schools were introduced at that time. The Labour party was looking for a programmme. It is looking for a programme again, if anyone has one to offer. The Labour party became the driver of the train of comprehensive schools. The Conservative party did not know what to do about it and became the brake man at the end of the train. The Labour party rushed towards it and the Conservative party tried to slow it down. Nobody knew what it was and what it was doing. It is interesting that no other country in Europe went that way, but we are still landed with it as against specialist schools.

The Conservative party now has a national curriculum and testing, but we should think about the organisation of secondary schools. It is all very well having grant-maintained schools, but they cannot all go their own way, otherwise we shall have a strange patchwork quilt of education. There will have to be some guidance.

The Bennett report of 1976 contained some interesting findings about testing and checking. It was undoubtedly read by the then Prime Minister, Lord Callaghan, who referred to it in his Ruskin college speech which was destroyed by the then Shirley Williams, now a member of the other House. That speech was a benchmark and would have done great good for the Labour party had it been followed through at the time.

The destruction of the national curriculum and testing at that time led to a deterioration of standards. The Bennett report showed from a study of 700 infant schools in Lancashire in which there is the constituency of my distinguished hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster (Dame E. Kellett-Bowman) that testing in schools and the 11-plus produced higher standards in mathematics and English and that the children were more at ease because they knew what they had to do. That report influenced what the then Labour Prime Minister said at the time.

I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends agree that the testing of individual children helps to ensure that schools are doing their jobs. Good teachers carry out regular tests purely and simply to make sure that the school is living up to its standards.

Over the past 15 or 20 years, and certainly over the past 30 years, we have had some of the worst schools in Europe. Our good schools remain good and the average ones continue, but in the centre of our cities—I always taught in downtown areas—we have some of the worst schools in Europe. That is why we decided to introduce testing.

Let me say something about the national curriculum. I am in favour of the tests, and I believe that they will raise education standards in Britain. However, the education establishments have made it all far too complicated. It has been said, rightly, that teachers are also responsible for that. They did not want simple pencil and paper tests; they wanted assessment, but it takes up too much time. The national curriculum takes up some 85 per cent. of time in secondary schools and primary schools. I believe that it should take up no more than 50 per cent. of time in secondary schools and 75 per cent. in primary schools so that secondary schools could teach second and third languages and the classics as well as specialised subjects.

I hope that Sir Ron Dinsey—I mean Sir Ron Dearing. I have a friend called Ron Dinsey who is also very distinguished and perhaps will be knighted. I shall leave the Secretary of State a note on the Board.

The Secretary of State said that the committee of 15, under the chairmanship of Sir Ron Dearing, would have at least one head teacher and one teacher. I should like there to be a majority of head teachers and teachers as they recognise children in the classroom, instead of all those education theorists. If a child came into the Chamber, they would not recognise him: they would probably think it was a Manx cat or something. We should get down to the classroom teachers as they are the ones doing the jobs.

To sum up my rather rapid speech—I have not had time to write it totally in verse as is my usual way—I welcome entirely national tests. They will be a great advantage to parents, particularly in downtown areas, if they can guarantee good standards. The state has no right to impose compulsory education without compulsory minimum standards. I welcome that, and at the same time I hope that we can reduce pressure on individual teachers and schools. It is a great reform, and I back the Secretary of State totally in it. Undoubtedly, with the help of Conservative Members, it will go on to even greater things.

Mr. Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South): I have no consultancies to declare in this debate, but I do have a more modest claim. I am still a member of the governing body of an imaginative, working-class, inner-city secondary school, which all of my children have had the privilege of attending. That school is not opposed in any way to a national curriculum or afraid of the notion of pupil assessments, but it does feel a huge sense of exasperation at the incompetence of the Government's current testing proposals. That exasperation is felt by parents, governors and teachers alike.

If the Secretary of State is allergic to the notion of listening to teachers' views, perhaps he would care to hear some of the views of head teachers in the city of Nottingham. I have spent a fair part of today speaking, by phone, to head teachers in Nottingham, asking them what views they would like passed on to the Secretary of State in this debate. It was a timely set of telephone calls, because all the head teachers of the city schools received a letter today from the Secretary of State—it was an SOS from the SoS—in which he said:

"If the test did not go ahead there would be no sound basis for an independent evaluation."

Yet that is precisely the basis on which head teachers are exasperated about his proposals, because the proposals themselves offer no sound basis for independent evaluation.

I have received a fax from the Nottinghamshire Association of Secondary Heads. This is not a trade union or a political organisation which would normally oppose, root and branch, the Government's policies. In the fax, the association has said publicly:

"Head Teachers are happy to implement the National Curriculum and believe that testing is an essential part of education. Such tests have always been used to measure pupil achievement. However, the Secondary Head Teachers of Nottinghamshire are very worried about the national tests, especially in English and Technology . . . Detailed information about courses and testing arrived late and in a piecemeal fashion.

The tests themselves have not been properly trialled nor validated."

The fax concludes with the following remarks:

"the way that testing is to be done this year is damaging to pupils' education."

When I rang around today, not a single head teacher would speak up in support of the Secretary of State's proposals.

When I spoke to individual head teachers, they were more forthcoming. The head teacher of one of the best performing schools in the city—one which one would expect to find to be most enthusiastic about the idea of assessments and stand to gain considerably from testing—was unequivocal in his condemnation of the approach of the Secretary of State. He said that the preparations for testing at key stage 3 had been

"detrimentally draining on the school's education programme"

"seriously undermined staff morale."

The Secretary of State mentioned the notion of improved standards, but another head teacher said that the English tests will not allow really able pupils to show their ability, and that one-word answers are not a way of demonstrating creative writing ability.

Other head teachers went further. They said that, if only the Secretary of State had asked them and had been willing to listen, he would have heard that the argument used in his letter—that schools

"had had three years to prepare for the tests"

—was an absolute lie. The information about the English tests arrived at the schools in January. That is the period of real preparation within which schools have been asked to organise their testing.

As school after school pointed out, there has not been enough time given to preparation and the approach to English that the Secretary of State is advocating would wreck good English teaching and force teachers to teach to a test, not to a sense of excitement about English. One went as far as to say that this was the closest he had come to understanding the notion of Stalinism in education: that what the Secretary of State was offering was a prescribed reading list around which English would be taught, and presumably inspired!

At one stage, elsewhere I understand, the Secretary of State has cited "Treasure Island" as an example of the books he has described as "a good read". To comment on this I should declare that I feel myself singularly privileged in many ways, because when I retreat from the House and spend some time with my children at the weekend, one of the joys for me is to read to them and with them. I feel privileged that I have three teenage children who still enjoy and get excited about poetry and literature . . . and in sharing it.

I invite the Secretary of State to listen to the reading list that my children would recommend to him. It would include a wide range of contemporary literature, which breaks through prejudice and offers different, more productive and enhancing role models which challenge the out-of-date stereotypes of race and gender in some of our older literature. My children could provide a wonderful reading list. But it would be lost on the right hon. Gentleman.

If the Secretary of State looks at "Treasure Island", for example, he would see that it offers two role models for women: one is an old crone and the other is a barmaid. If he thinks that such role models would inspire young girls to get excited about literature, he should be sent back to start his education all over again.

If the Secretary of State is not happy to do that, perhaps he would go back to his own notion about the testing that he held last year. We have heard from some of my other colleagues that the results of last year's pilot testing have not been declared. Let me offer some information about some of the pilot testing done in Nottingham. It might be the litmus test against which the Government's education proposals should be measured.

One of the schools tested was an independent school —the Nottingham high school for boys—and my understanding of its reaction to those tests is that now it will not touch SATs. Although the school was part of the pilot, it rejected out of hand the notion of continued involvement in SATs. Why? It found them time-wasting, badly constructed and a poor way of showing what the school already knew. That is the litmus test against which the Ministers claim, that they 'were well received' and had a broad base of support. If the independent schools will not touch them, why should anyone else?

I put on record my unequivocal support for the action that teachers up and down the country are taking in boycotting these tests. I will explain why, in very personal terms. Not long ago, one of my sons submitted a written piece in English and tried to work a flanker. He had not bothered to do much work on it or much preparation. The work he handed in was somewhat shoddy and ill prepared. To her credit, the teacher looked at it and said to my son, "What do you call this? It's rubbish. You have not put any effort into this. How can you expect me to treat this as a serious piece of work and mark it seriously when you have neglected the duties and responsibilities which, at this stage of your education, I expect you to live up to?"—and she threw it back at him. I saw her a couple of days later and she said to me, "I hope that you were not offended about it." I said, "Offended? I was pleased that you did it, because you sent my lad scuttling back home, and he has worked like a beaver on it". He went back and rewrote it, and delivered it in the sort of terms that he had to in order to meet the standards of education the school expected.

Will the Secretary of State do the same—because that is precisely what teachers are saying about his own offering? Teachers are saying that the proposals are shoddy and ill thought out, and should be taken back to square one and completely rethought.

I do not for one moment believe that the Secretary of State will do that. One of the tragedies of this debate and of the Government's education policies in general is that the Secretary of State does not have a fraction of my son's understanding of what real learning is about. The right hon. Gentleman does not have my son's wisdom in knowing how to learn from his own mistakes. Nor does he have a fraction of my own gratitude to teachers who are prepared to stand up and confront such ill-prepared and incompetent acts of educational folly.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

7 pm

Sir Malcolm Thornton (Crosby): For nearly 30 years in elected office, at local and national level, I have been a passionate and vocal supporter of standards in education. I wish to make clear at the outset my support for the main principles of the reforms—for the national curriculum and for the absolute necessity of testing as an integral part of that curriculum. Without testing, we cannot be sure that the right measurement is being made.

I quote from two reports. One said:

"Things have improved within the last 30 years . . . But the educational opportunities offered in most of our towns, and in nearly all our country districts, to boys or girls who do not proceed to the universities, but leave school at 16, are still far behind the requirements of our time".

The second, referring to final examinations, stated:

"we feel that the schools themselves may become uncertain in their aim and vacillating in their methods, if they have no suggestion of a definite standard to guide their work . . . There is wisdom in the saying of Plato, that 'the life without examination is a life that can hardly be lived'".

Those reports were dated 1895 and 1924 respectively. The more things change, the more they stay the same. The debate has turned on statements such as "A return to the golden age." Those reports show clearly that the golden age, if it ever existed, exists largely in people's imagination.

[Sir Malcolm Thornton]

The progressive reforms that we put in place in the 1980s are vital. The Education Reform Act 1988 brought matters to a head, and we are now starting to see the benefits flow through. I agree with all of that. Recent reports, some of which have been attributed to me, would have one believe that I am opposed to the Secretary of State for Education's efforts. Not so. I am totally behind the principles of his stewardship in that Department.

It is vital for the success of our children that the reforms succeed, although I have found differences in the implementation of some of the reforms. I believe strongly in the sort of statements that have been made by Professor Alan Smithers, a member of the National Curriculum Council. For example, he said in a recent television broadcast that it was important to have a balance between external testing and internal assessment. If we can get that balance right, we shall get testing right and achieve the benefits that flow from a wide curriculum. We shall also have the rigour of external standard tests, enabling national assessments to be made, which in turn will benefit pupils, teachers and parents alike.

Comments have been made about the report of the Office for Standards in Education. The Ofsted report also says that a fine balance must be drawn and that the dangers of teaching to the test—if the tests are too prescriptive—must be avoided at all costs. It is important that that is taken on board in any future review.

The teacher unions have made many statements in recent weeks. I believe the boycott to be totally wrong. I appreciate the frustrations and understand many of the points that moderate teachers have made when writing to me over the months, but the boycott can do nothing but harm to the children and to the case of moderate teachers who wish to bring about change, and I condemn it unequivocally. It would take us back to the bad old days and allow a handful of militants in trade unions to use this focused debate to destroy the whole essence of the reform programme. That cannot be right, and I would not wish to be associated with it in any respect.

But to deny that there is frustration is to misunderstand the huge volume of feeling that exists in many schools about the implementation of what is proposed and the way in which it is impacting on teaching practice. It is also important to consider whether it will work and deliver what the Secretary of State and I wish to achieve, which is improved standards.

My right hon. Friend might consider the possibility of a way forward, and it can be no more than that. The threat of a boycott and its consequent disruption hangs over the schools. It would be in no one's interest and might be against the law. We shall have to wait and see. It would cause enormous problems for head teachers and governing bodies. I am married to one and am a chairman of governors, so I speak with feeling on the subject.

The Secretary of State has made two concessions. He said that there would be no reporting of the tests. The fundamental point made in the early correspondence was that they should be piloted and unreported. That concession has been made. He has promised a review of the national curriculum, and Sir Ron Dearing has, I hope, our full support in the work that lies ahead for him. He has a major job, and should be given a chance to get on with it. I was encouraged earlier when I think I saw the Secretary of State nod in assent at the suggestion that politicians should back away a little.

Although I have made no secret of my belief that an abandonment of, or making voluntary, the tests for this year is perhaps a way forward, if that is not to be, a shift in the way that teacher opinion is sought could do much to persuade the majority of teachers, who are moderate, who support testing and assessment and who want to make the national curriculum work, that their views will be heeded.

It is no use having the odd head teacher or teacher sitting on a working party or national body. However experienced, such people represent no one's views but their own. My right hon. Friend should seriously consider setting up opportunities by which groups of practising teachers and head teachers, perhaps regionally or at LEA level, have the chance to comment in detail on the way in which the principles of the reforms are implemented and on their practicability. That would be a significant and welcome move.

Moderate teacher opinion would be more likely to turn away from confrontation if those teachers felt that their voices would be heard and that their professionalism and expertise would be put to good use. It would be a challenge to the teacher unions to show clearly whether their rhetoric of support for testing is matched by their willingness to allow their members to co-operate. Education for our children—for the future of the nation—works best when a genuine partnership exists.

Mr. Patten: I have been listening with care to my hon. Friend, the Chairman of the Select Committee, and I assure him that it goes without saying that the Government welcome the possibility of groups of teachers, along the lines that my hon. Friend suggested, making their views known, regionally and locally, to the review that Sir Ron Dearing is starting. That is exactly what Sir Ron wishes to happen. That is important, and I welcome my hon. Friend's suggestion. I am sure that Sir Ron Dearing will also welcome it.

Sir Malcolm Thornton: I thank my right hon. Friend for that intervention.

As I was saying, education works best when a genuine partnership exists in which the views and experience of all are taken into account in the evolutionary development of the education system. Consensus is not a dirty word. While Government must clearly set the framework, those who work in the schools must be allowed to exercise their professional judgment and the benefits of their practical experience if they are to feel that sense of ownership that is vital.

Whatever the outcome of the current dispute, my right hon. Friend's most urgent task is to use his good offices, as only he can, to bring about that genuine partnership. That would be a signal achievement. It is the way forward to restore the belief which most parents and all moderate teachers, who are the vast majority, have in the need——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Time up.

7.10 pm

Miss Joan Lestor (Eccles): It is so long since I taught that I would not use that as a qualification for speaking in the debate. When one has been a Member for a long time, like the previous Secretary of State for Education, and has lived through arguments about setting, streaming, banding, comprehensive education and the great debate on education which was launched by the present Lord Callaghan, that is a qualification for making a contribution. Memory is very important in the House. I remember the statistics which showed that a previous Conservative Secretary of State for Education, later to become Prime Minister, closed more grammar schools than any Labour Government ever closed. I just make that point in passing.

I have always been in favour of a national curriculum, and I do not want what I am about to say to make people think that I want to move backwards, but the Secretary of State did a great disservice to teachers in the 1970s and 1980s. The impression has been given, as hon. Members will see if they read Hansard, that at that time parents had no knowledge of what their children were doing.

Like most sentimental mothers, I have at home a drawer full of documents about my children which in my old age I will look at with tears in my eyes. They are the reports of my children and the children I fostered at that time. They all attended state primary schools and comprehensive schools in the 1970s and 1980s. The reports told me how they were achieving. A remedial boy who needed special help was given the utmost attention and assistance so that he might achieve better.

For the Secretary of State to give the impression that teachers at that time were not assessing their pupils and that no testing was taking place is a total misrepresentation of what was going on in education. When the Secretary of State and other hon. Members read what they said, they should have the grace to say that they were wrong. Thousands of parents like me, whose kids went through the system at that time, knew what their children were doing.

The method of testing was different. It was not competitive, as it was when I was at school, when information about who was first, second, third, fourth and fifth was put up on the wall. Although I was not knocked across the room by my father or mother like the right hon. Member for Brent, North (Sir R. Boyson)—which may account for his views—nevertheless I have always questioned that system of classing children as successes or failures in education.

I want to concentrate on nursery education, on which the Secretary of State refused to comment. I have always been apprehensive about the testing of children at the age of seven, particularly because we have a declining industry in nursery education. The nursery programme is becoming the casualty in many local authorities which are starved of resources. Indeed, many Tory authorities in particular have never put great stress on nursery education. The playgroup movement is in grave financial difficulties because it has become the substitute for nursery education in many areas. At least one hon. Member was present at the launch of the appeal of the playgroup movement for funds and greater assistance from the Government.

Many children are denied any nursery experience. Therefore, some children who go to school at the age of five will have only two years of experience of school before being tested at seven. In some areas where there is only a once-a-year entry, children born in July will start school when they are aged four years and two months. Some will go into attractive reception classes equipped as nursery classes. Although I would prefer proper nursery education, I recognise the benefits of such classes, but many will go into ordinary classes and will be expected to participate in more formal education.

If testing is done at the age of seven, some children will have been three years in primary school, but some will have been there only two years; some will have had nursery education and some will not. Will any hon. Member who knows anything about young children tell me that all those children can be tested successfully at the age of seven on the same basis? It is absolute nonsense. Even one year less will make a difference to children throughout their school life until they begin to catch up at the age of 12 or 13. Most teachers recognise that. The fact that we are driven to once-a-year entry for children is very worrying in relation to tests.

Some hon. Members have referred to the continent. We do badly in what we offer our young children. In most European countries, children start school much later, at the age of seven, having had superb pre-school provision. Our children are robbed of that experience.

When the Secretary of State talks about the value of testing for very young children, I question it very much. I support the testing which took place in the past when parents knew how their chlldren were measuring up. With such testing, any teacher could tell parents at any time how their children were doing, because that was their function. That is why I get angry when I hear people like the Secretary of State dismissing what happened in the 1970s and 1980s as if teachers were not communicating at all with parents. That is rubbish. We all went to parent-teacher evenings and discussed what was happening. As I said, we have reports to prove it.

There was a time when I had some hopes of the Secretary of State. He kept being photographed with his young child, and I thought that anyone who loved a little child must have some good in him. I still like to think that that is so, but pomposity and dogma are no substitute for proper educational debate. Sadly, we have listened to much dogma and pomposity in the debate. There has been no real contribution to solving the problems which teachers are facing in schools today.

Mr. David Madel (Bedfordshire, South-West): As has been said, the debate comes at a time of continuing reform in the education service. In a democracy a government are always under pressure to get quick results, but steady progress in the classroom and increasing parental support and commitment to the education service are not, alas, headline news. It is only when things go wrong that education gets the headlines.

Of course, the debate comes about also as a result of the problem over testing. Concern about testing is not confined to seaside conferences. Many people who are not involved in education politics but who are committed to the education service do not think that we have got matters quite right. Such people want to work with the Government in the laudable desire to raise standards and thereby expand opportunities for young people.

Therefore, much rests on Sir Ron Dearing and his new committee to sort matters out. We must stop the slide from ballots to boycotts and inevitable legal action which will benefit only the lawyers and certainly will not benefit many young people who are close to taking their GCSE and A-level examinations this summer term.

[Mr. David Madel]

I suggest two immediate guidelines which I hope that Sir Ron and his committee can establish with the teaching profession as common ground. First, the more standards improve in schools, the greater the support for the teaching profession. Secondly, performance needs to improve fastest in the middle and lower ability groups so that we can better compete with our industrial competitors.

Perhaps I may say a little about the changes which Sir Ron and his committee need to bring about in the tests. The people who have been constructing the tests so far subject by subject seem to have regarded them as a sort of Christmas tree; they keep putting extra things on the tree. We need early syllabus information and no late changes in the syllabus. We need a big reduction in the amount of printed material and paperwork that passes to the schools. It must be recognised that more preparation time is needed for both teachers and students. I particularly want tests for 14-year-olds to be dovetailed into the GCSE exams, which are looming pretty close for young people of 14. I do not want the tests for 14-year-olds to be an odd branch line, but part of the main track towards raising standards at GCSE level.

In his "Who's Who" entry, Sir Ron Dearing lists one of his hobbies as do-it-yourself. If he can establish new and better guidelines on testing that are acceptable to the teaching profession, the schools will certainly do a lot for themselves and provide parents, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and his Department with the helpful information that they need, subject by subject, so that pupils' weaknesses can be corrected.

I agree with the first words of the Opposition motion, which mentions the "need for stability" in schools. I believe that stability in schools encourages the Government to build on existing good practice in schools. The Conservative manifesto said that popular schools that become oversubscribed would be given the necessary funds to expand, which is a hugely popular policy and good practice. Many parents cannot wait to see more evidence of popular, oversubscribed schools expanding as a result of parental demand.

With the local management of schools, more and more schools are steadily arranging for homework to be done at school rather than at home. Many homes in this country are, alas, simply unsuitable places for young people to do their homework. Much good practice is being built up in schools whereby pupils stay at school after school hours to do their homework. That good practice should be expanded. There is more than enough evidence that the better the homework, the better the exam results.

I was delighted that the report of the Office for Standards in Education of March 1993 stated:

"the 20-day INSET courses for primary school teachers have been effective and were much appreciated by the teachers."

Such good practice should be built on. It will be welcomed by parents and teachers if they can see that the courses positively benefit teachers, which will inevitably lead to higher standards in the classroom.

If schools continue to improve their careers guidance, underpinned by rising standards, the numbers who can usefully use the education system—with all that it has to offer—after school will expand. The country will also benefit from the fact that more and more people are going into higher and further education, which has been a great triumph of the Government. That increase largely depends, not just on standards in the classroom, but on good careers guidance in schools to ensure that young people make the right choices.

We must give the national curriculum a chance. Some people seem terribly keen to keep pulling it up and inspecting its roots. It is taking root well and simply needs to be given a chance. Above all, we must ensure that the tests, which must go ahead, are seen as supports to the public examination system and a means of raising standards. Raising standards in schools not only creates domestic happiness in families; it improves the country's economy in relation to that of its competitors, which is of the utmost importance.

Mr. Derek Enright (Hemsworth): We should consider for a moment why our children are at school and how we should treat them once they have gone to school. We send our children to school, first and foremost, to encourage in them a sense of excitement about learning. They do not go to school to be given tests or a prescribed body of knowledge. The teachers should enthuse the pupils by the way in which they teach the subjects.

It does not matter which history syllabus is used; it does not matter whether it is a wild west syllabus. If pupils are enthused by the way in which the topic is approached, they will read for themselves about what happened with Oliver Cromwell, the Commonwealth or the first world war. The most important factor is to grasp pupils' imagination at both primary and secondary school and ensure that they retain that imagination.

The national curriculum will be tested in so far as it achieves that aim. Teachers must be able to interpret it and provide it for the children so that they benefit from it and continue to learn, not only for the brief period that they are at school, but for the rest of their lives. Children will then develop habits and a way of living so that they continue to read and study and have an inquisitive knowledge of life.

The hon. Member for Crosby (Sir M. Thornton) quoted Plato and said that life must have its examination. Plato did say that, but he did so in the context of self-examination. We must give pupils the ability to look at themselves, analyse themselves and see where they are placed in relation to the rest of society. The reforms proposed by the Secretary of State and those already introduced will be successful if they contribute to that goal. They will be successful if they make pupils, not economic beings, but useful, essential and lively parts of the society to which they belong. That aim is crucial, which is why I am extremely worried about some of the reforms that have taken place.

Not much has been said in today's debate about the Office for Standards in Education. It has been quoted, although it has been in existence for only a couple of years and has not yet officially produced its first reports on schools. It has produced pilot reports, which I have been lucky—or unlucky—enough to see. Compared with the old reports of Her Majesty's inspectorate of schools, the Ofsted reports are poor and pathetic creatures. They are meagre and seem exactly like painting by numbers—a sort of MOT for education. They do not diagnose the problems within even the weakest schools so that they can be strengthened—a great flaw of the reports.

When I made inquiries about why the organisation was so weak, the reason became clear. One sample of those being trained—three people being trained locally—showed that they were aged 67, 69 and 70. Those people were embarking on a new career in examining what is needed for the young. It is simply not good enough. The Secretary of State must look carefully at the quality of the people entering Ofsted, or the reports that it produces will be unimaginative and useless to the state, school or individual pupil.

When we consider the speaking of standard English, which is a serious issue, are we suggesting that it is exemplified by the hon. Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) or by the hon. Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Evans) —the sort of estuary English that we heard this evening? Are those the models on which to base our English? Much nonsense has been talked and it is impossible to decide what constitutes standard spoken English. It is not good enough to intrude in the particular delicate way that the Secretary of State has proposed.

English needs a little common sense. In an article in The Guardian today, Martin Turner says that what the Government are doing with English is splendid. He is a member of the English committee and he is awfully proud of it. I quote two paragraphs. He talks about "'writing (including Spelling, Grammar and Handwriting)', with six Strands: Composition, Forms of Writing, and Handwriting (which merge from Level 6), Grammar, and Punctuation (which merge at Level 1 and above Level 5), and Spelling (which joins Forms of Writing and Presentation at Level 7)."

Is that an example of someone who is trying to tell our children how to produce clear and concise English?

Towards the end, writing in a less technical vein, he says:

"Writers are 'significant', 'major', 'reputable'. Such terms contain an appeal to implicit criteria which remain tacit."

Perhaps someone can translate that for me into any language, I do not mind which. He goes on:

"The stance is not chauvinistic but liberal. The bubbling republic of world letters is neither excluded nor ignored, but welcomed as literature in English".

It really will not do that people who are attempting to set curricula are so divorced from what is happening in schools and from our young people that they produce such contentious nonsense.

We are not helped by the Secretary of State when he makes his analyses of the state of education today. One day they are upbeat and the next day they are downbeat. Let us examine the important question of illiteracy. It is extremely important that we deal with the 30 per cent. of children who are not, frankly, well dealt with at the moment in our schools and for whom we have to find imaginative paths out.

But that said, when it comes down to it, illiteracy does not affect one in three, as was suggested by the Secretary of State. The report from which he quotes gives a figure of 16 per cent. How is that defined? It says that 16 per cent. have a reading age that is under 14. But the same report says that virtually nobody is illiterate now. Figures for 1951, before comprehensive schools came into existence, from the then Department of Education—so they must be correct—show that 30 per cent. of people aged 15 had reading ages under the age of nine. Therefore, there has been a considerable improvement since then and it is important to recognise that fact. Illiteracy, or an inability to read and write, was also constant at that time.

I could go on to mention tests and so on, but the real resource that we have in our schools is our teachers. Some teachers are brilliant, some are reasonable and some are not so good. But the amount of time that they put in is phenomenal. One thing that we do not measure is the voluntary time that is put in by our teachers. Nor do we know how long pupils spend on extra work outside school which, in other countries, is done in school.

Sir Paul Beresford (Croydon, Central): The Labour party's motion talks of instability and calls for stability. It talks of too much change and of stopping key stage 3 tests. In many ways it is saying, "Let's sit back on our hands." That has been followed up in the debate with the cry, "Standards are low" and "The Government should be acting". That is a rather contrary posture to take. Part of the Government acting is to utilise the opportunity of testing. We need to use the tests at various stages to discover progress nationally, not just of the individual pupil or the individual school. In making progress—or hoping to make that progress—the Government have the big problem of the local education authorities between them and the schools.

This evening there has been a lack of attention to our education clients—the parents and pupils. They wish to know how our schools are functioning. They want to know how their local schools are functioning compared with the national standard. They want to be able to choose a school, with some knowledge, so that they can maximise their children's abilities as they progress towards the work force. When their child is in school, they also want to know whether he or she is progressing. Tests are a key factor in that—tests, not individually but nationally; standardisation of tests.

I think that all hon. Members accept that standards need to be raised. A number of facts have been given as examples. We should not necessarily compare ourselves now with ourselves in the past. We should be looking towards our competitors. When one hears that the average standard of maths for a 14-year-old in Britain's state schools compares with that of an 11-year-old in Germany, we have reason to be concerned. We need to raise our standards.

However, the Labour party's motion says, "Don't rock the boat. Stand back and watch it gently sink." The Labour party is talking about stagnation when what we need is a continuation of the stimulation that has already started—started by the Government in 1988.

First, as has been mentioned, there is the broad national curriculum. Secondly, there is the movement into testing and the publication of those results. Finally, as was touched on earlier, there is the chance for schools to break away from the frequently dead hand of their local education authority by going grant maintained.

All that said, I was delighted that the Secretary of State announced a full range review. That means that he is listening. But I am also delighted that he has recognised that parents and pupils wish to know where they stand. He wishes, as do I, that the tests should continue.

As the exercise this evening seems to be that we should touch on points for the review that is to follow the tests, I shall mention one or two. I certainly support the idea of the national curriculum, particularly with three or perhaps even four out of the total seven subjects. I also support the attainment targets and the programme studies. In addition, there are the four key stage tests. My right hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley (Mr. Baker) mentioned that there could have been a spot of hijacking by the profession. Perhaps we could look at the possibility of testing in three or four of the core subjects—English, maths, science and, perhaps, technology—leaving the rest of the various subjects for the schools to test in their own way looking towards GCSE. I realise that that may hurt the sensibilities of some teachers in those specific subjects, but practicality may dictate it.

We have from Professor Black and his task group on assessment and testing a complicated system of 10 attainment targets, on 10 subjects, covering four key age groups, which is complicated. Furthermore, specific marks are available for allocation to specific age groups. To my mind, that engenders the impression that there will be progress in our schools, when in reality there has not been, merely because of the way in which those particular marks can be allocated by teachers to the various age groups.

During the devising of all the complications, I understand that the teachers' unions requested more classroom assessment. The problem is that that was heeded, bringing a greater work load to classrooms. That arrangement also favours children with helpful parents, diminishes the chance of a realistic nationally assessed standard, and hurts children from homes where the environment is not educationally helpful.

The answer is an increase in paper and pencil tests. The mere mention of them provokes the cry of teaching to tests —so what? If the syllabus is broad and not too prescriptive, and if the tests within it are selective, that approach can succeed. It succeeded before and continues to do so in many other areas today. I am sure that it will do so again.

As for grant-maintained schools, it is a delight that they will be able to break out from their local education authorities. That is an excellent first step, but I hope that we continue with stimulation rather than stagnation. We need to move on. Grant-maintained schools need further independence and to be in the situation whereby their revenue, and the revenue aspect of their capital, improves on that independence. We should use those schools as independent schools serving state-funded pupils, rather than state-funded schools serving the pupils.

As for the main topic of this debate, those tests must go forward so that the review mentioned frequently this evening will have substance and provide a basis on which to work.

Mr. Cynog Dafis (Ceredigion and Pembroke, North): I speak as someone who spent 31 years in a classroom teaching English—yes, English, and I am delighted to have done so. It was hard work, and we should all acknowledge that teaching is hard work. It is physically and mentally hard, and emotionally demanding. Few people are as exhausted at the end of their day's work as teachers. I have no regrets about spending all those years teaching. The work gave me great joy and satisfaction—but as I look back on that experience, I realise that it was soured to some extent by the experience of the latter years.

I will speak for teachers tonight, and especially for teachers of English, and for pupils. The one thing that they need is stability. The one thing that saps energy, undermines morale, and breeds anxiety and uncertainty —and has the negative effect that they all create—is the constant chopping and changing that has typified education in recent years. We must not underestimate the damage to the educational process done by the massive reorganisation envisaged in the current Education Bill, which could be incalculable.

I was head of English at a comprehensive school when the GCSE was pushed through a year too soon. I undertook the massive increase in workload that suddenly came upon us at that time. I know of the long hours spent outside the classroom on training courses, and so on, to the great detriment of a whole year of pupils.

Those of us teaching English were given the choice of setting 30 per cent., 50 per cent. or 100 per cent. course work. We were made to feel unco-operative and guilty if we did not go for the maximum option. It was said that all really good teachers went for that. I had left teaching when the same Government said that teachers must not on any account set more than 30 per cent. course work.

I was head of English too when successive drafts of the expensively printed and bound national curriculum arrived on teachers' desks, with its impenetrable maze of programmes of study, key stages, levels, strands, attainment targets, and standards of attainment. There were 17 strands across five attainment targets.

I remember discussions, under systems of continuous assessment, as to the level that each of the 30 pupils in a class had attained in each of those 17 strands. We tried to devise ways of conveying that mass of information to parents in a form of which they could make some sense. We did not know whether to laugh or to cry. In those days, the most familiar sound in staff rooms and on training courses was the belly laugh. That saved us from going crazy.

I applaud much of the independence stance adopted by the National Curriculum Council for Wales in its recent document, and I will return to that point later. However, I cannot accept its claim in a press statement dated 15 April that the current order has gained widespread acceptance by teachers. I checked this morning by telephoning a teacher of English who knows the opinion among former colleagues in my constituency. It is plain that the order has not gained widespread acceptance. It has serious deficiencies and, specifically, it is unmanageable.

I left teaching before standard attainment tests were introduced, so I did not have to endure being told in November 1992 which Shakespeare text would be tested the following summer; or until January 1993 before the additional reading list for the same tests was supplied; or until February 1993, before the poetry anthology was provided. Think of the effect on carefully constructed courses, planned to meet the requirements of the new curriculum, paced over weeks. Think of the effect on the attempt to provide a balanced syllabus, and the concentration given to those texts, in order to get them done in time for the examinations.

I left teaching before the announcement was made that there was to be a review of the English curriculum. I was not there to enjoy the combination of relief and cynical self-righteousness that I would have felt had I still been a teacher, nor the fury, given that the change meant that many of the long hours that I had spent devising courses were largely wasted.

We should all acknowledge that those experiences—I have touched on only some of them—lie behind the decision to boycott tests, together with the realisation that an assessment authority is to conduct a review of the national curriculum. The tests therefore seem entirely redundant. Much of that misery could have been avoided if the powers that be—by which I mean politicians but also academics and curriculum developers—had listened to teachers.

However, it is an ill wind that blows no one any good. One truly progressive element of the national curriculum was knowledge about language. At the school at which I taught, we used that element as an opportunity for collaboration between the English and Welsh departments in the construction of a two-week teaching module based on a pupil's experience of bilingualism. We studied dialect and accent, the relationship between dialect and accent and prestige, and the relationship between prestige and language choice—the choice between English and Welsh in particular circumstances and in a particular context. We examined the influence of one language on another, and what governed that influence—whether it is the influence of English on Welsh, the influence of Welsh on English or the influence of French or Latin on both. We studied Welsh literature in English lessons, and English literature in Welsh lessons. The exercise was visibly fascinating for the pupils, and it was intended to be a regular component of the English and Welsh syllabus—which would have justified a considerable input of time and resources.

A flexible curriculum should encompass just such arrangements; but we have now been told that knowledge of language is to be replaced by the confident use of standard English. In other words, the use of standard English is to replace a creative, scope-giving element. We are told that, in England at least, seven-year-old pupils' English is to be corrected if it does not conform to the standard. It is difficult to imagine a more effective way of undermining fluency, stunting the growth of linguistic competence and damaging the interactive relationship between language and learning.

That does not apply to Wales, thank goodness, unless the recommendations of the Curriculum Council for Wales are overridden. I hope that that will not happen. I urge the Secretary of State to read the CCW's explanatory note about standard English——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Time is up.

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Mid-Staffordshire): The hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Dafis) has taught English. I must confess that I have not done so myself, although, before going up to university, I taught mathematics and physics for a year in a secondary school. Moreover, while studying for my doctorate before disappearing to the university of Southern California, I was a tutor for London university masters degree students, teaching binomial techniques in economic forecasting. That only goes to prove—to me, at least—that any form of economic forecasting is not worth the paper on which it is written. I am told, however, that this is an education debate, not a Treasury debate.

I want to say something about the teaching of English—not because I was a teacher for a year, albeit not an English teacher, but on the basis of my experience as an employer. Nigel de Gruchy, general secretary of a union with a rather unwieldy name—the National Association of Schoolmasters/Union of Women Teachers—said:

"Even Stalin did not force standard Russian down his subjects' throats."

That, incidentally, demonstrates an appalling lack of knowledge of the USSR. Because of its vast size and the lack of communication, there was no standard Russian, as is still the case; but I would not expect Nigel de Gruchy to know that. There was no democratic tradition, no standard Russian grammar, no promotion based on merit and no internal or external market in the old Soviet Union.

Last night, I read Mr. de Gruchy's entry in "Who's Who". He lists his hobbies as golf, cricket, football, music, opera, France, Spain and—wait for it—literature. Mr. de Gruchy has been a teacher and a trade unionist for most of his life. That, to me, rather sums up the naivety of his comments about what should and should not be taught in schools. What I cannot forgive him, however, is his elitism, which implicitly states, "I will enjoy literature to the full, having had the benefit of an education at De La Salle college in Jersey"—he might care to admit that—"and degrees from the universities of Reading, London and Paris". He does not want others to enjoy the same benefits of a good education.

I like quoting Dr. Johnson, because he was born and educated in the great cathedral city of Lichfield, which I have the honour to represent. Dr. Johnson said:

"Language is the Pedigree of Nations."

That is true.

Mr. Enright: Will the hon. Gentleman quote the next phrase?

Mr. Fabricant: I remember from my university studies that, according to a principle in social psychology, "language is the font of a nation's culture". I consider it tremendously important how the language is spoken.

Only last year, Nigel de Gruchy said in The Independent that to include Shakespeare in English tests was "fine for grammar school kids, but boring and irrelevant for a good half of pupils."

That says little for de Gruchy's faith in the ability of either pupils or teachers. Perhaps he opposes testing for the same reason; it is very sad.

The proposed reading lists in the national curriculum are not extensive. In his "Epistulae ad Lucilium", Seneca says of books:

"It is the quality rather than the quantity that matters; a limited list of reading benefits; a varied assortment serves only for delight".

How appropriate that quotation is.

Nigel de Gruchy has something in common with Stalin: neither has lived in the real world. I must admit that I have something in common with Stalin—I am sure that you will find that hard to believe, Mr. Deputy Speaker—in that I share his love of vino krasna Gruzinska, Georgian red wine. It is excellent and I hope that it will be introduced in the Palace of Westminster.

As others have pointed out, last year's pilot tests for 14-year-olds revealed that one in three children had the reading and writing ability of nine to 11-year-olds. Moreover—this has not yet been pointed out—one in 20 was shown to have the ability of seven-year-olds. That was revealed by testing. What does Labour fear so much? Are

[Mr. Fabricant]

Labour Members so frightened of exposing the weaknesses that exist in some schools? There is no room for complacency; Nigel de Gruchy had better begin to accept that and so should the Labour party.

Before I was a Member of Parliament, I had to employ engineers and other staff. For 10 or 11 years, I worked in the real world. I was not a special adviser and I have never worked for Conservative central office, but I was involved in the manufacturing industry. We had to employ engineers and staff who spoke coherent English.

The point is that English is an international language. The French try to preserve English, because French is almost a minority language in the world now, while English is an international language. It is essential that when our salesmen or engineers go abroad they speak coherent English: it is no good speaking a form of dialect English that is not understandable in Nairobi, Kampala, Java, Moscow, Reykjavik or Sao Paulo, all of which I have visited. Language is there for the purpose of communication.

I have a weakness: I cannot eat with a fork in my right hand and a knife in my left, although I know that I should do so. I also know that when I eat a bowl of soup I should hold the plate away from myself. My point is that having table manners gives me the confidence to eat with my peers. Similarly, I believe that knowing the rules of grammar gives people the confidence to communicate—whether they are selling engineering products or communicating ideas. My one criticism of the present schooling system is that, sadly, students aged 15 or 16 are still asked to specialise in the sciences or the arts for their A-levels. My hon. Friend the Minister is aware of my views on AS-levels.

Mr. Win Griffiths: But he is not listening to you, is he?

Mr. Fabricant: The hon. Gentleman says that my hon. Friend does not listen to me, but I have always found that my right hon. and hon. Friends in the Department for Education are the most listening and caring of people. They do not believe that the curriculum should be written in tablets of stone. My God, if it were up to the Opposition Front Bench, a science curriculum would be taught that ranged from the Venerable Bede to Newton and was never changed. The all-important point is that, as circumstances change, the curriculum changes.

There are those who argue that punctuation and grammatical structures are unimportant—that language is dynamic and ever-changing. That is true. There are those who argue that regional dialects and regional words have their place. That is also true. There is a time and place for colloquial English. Rousseau said that accent is the soul of a language and gives feeling and truth to it. Nigel de Gruchy and others of his ilk may sneer at the goal of testing and at the goal of teaching proper pronunciation and grammar, but Nigel de Gruchy has never had to employ anyone. He has never actually worked or lived in the commercial world.

Sadly, both in this debate on education and in other debates, the Opposition display a naivety which comes from never having lived in the real world and from prescribing for their children that which is not for the benefit of the nation or the nation's children, but which is self-seeking and self-serving—the socialist claptrap and dogma that we hear every day when we come here.

8.1 pm

Mrs. Bridget Prentice (Lewisham, East): Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker, for calling me to speak in this debate, in which we are dealing with major issues that directly affect many pupils and parents in my constituency. I have to declare an interest, in that I, too, have been a member of the NUT and the NAS/UWT. Like the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Dafis), I was a teacher of English. It is strange that the only two people who have spoken so far in the debate who at one time were teachers of English come from countries beyond England's borders.

I listened with interest to the speech of the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Fabricant). As someone who claimed to be a mathematician, I was struck by the fact that he displayed so little logic in his speech. I was more interested, though, in the Secretary of State's speech and wondered whether he would pass the tests that he is so eager that our young people should take. I have very little hope for him, despite the fact that I had low expectations of him in the first place.

Let us consider some of the Secretary of State's phraseology. He said that my hon. Friend the Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor) blew it when she made her speech. If, however, the Secretary of State were to pass key stage 3 in English, which I use because that is probably closer to his chronological age than key stage 1 or key stage 2, he would have to be able to convey complex ideas and views in clear, fluent, standard English that suited the particular listeners and circumstances and that included the correct use of a wide vocabulary, and he would have to display the ability to retain his listeners' interest through the originality and clarity of the ideas conveyed. I found nothing terribly original in what the Secretary of State said. His clarity left a great deal to be desired. Indeed, he was incapable of answering the questions put to him by my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Yardley (Ms Morris). It seems to me that he would not survive key stage 3.

Perhaps, therefore, we should consider key stage 2. At that stage, the Secretary of State would need to be able to offer a fluent and well-organised account of an experience or activity and be able to convey information and ideas accurately, giving reasoned, sustained and detailed accounts of activities and viewpoints. The Secretary of State would have to learn to solve problems by defining the nature of the difficulty and suggesting solutions. Although he accused Opposition Members of ranting, he gave a very good example of exactly that. When pressed to do so, again and again he refused to admit that one way to resolve this difficult problem in which he finds himself would be to ballot parents on whether they would allow their children to take this test, in exactly the same way as parents in Scotland can make choices about whether their children should take the test. It appears that the Secretary of State would also fail at key stage 2.

As for key stage 1, the Secretary of State should be able to give simple, audible explanations—we cannot blame him entirely for the fact that the microphone was switched off for a short time during his speech—narratives and descriptions. He should also learn to listen attentively to others and make thoughtful comments. Given the response from parents, governors, teachers' unions and professionals, it is clear that the Secretary of State is incapable of listening attentively to others. He has been singularly unable to make thoughtful comments, since he referred to organisations such as the National Parents Association as neanderthal and to professional teachers, whom he constantly tells us he respects, as Luddites.

There we have it. The Secretary of State, the Dan Quayle of the Conservative party, who does not know whether an "e" should be in a word or out of a word, would hardly be considered to be the best boy in the class after today's performance. On reflection, the Secretary of State may be thankful that teachers will not be testing him on key stage 3 and his ability and peformance today.

Teachers in Lewisham have written to me and my colleagues regarding their fears about testing. For example, the teachers at Catford county girls school say that they believe that the tests are unsound—that the format of the tests has been changed frequently without teacher consultation and that the English standard assessment tasks

"have not had an adequate full-scale national pilot."

Those are the people who, every day of the week, are teaching children. They know best what should happen in their classrooms.

The head teacher of a school in Croydon, who is one of my constituents, said:

"Apart from the intellectual absurdity of a set book list for Year 9 (both in principle and in content), it is not good enough for SEAC to send out a booklet containing many unanswered questions, on the last day of November, just to adhere to the published timetable.

It is clear to us, at the chalkface, that the whole operation is behind schedule, rushed, and subject to change. This is not the way to run a National Curriculum or to communicate with teachers who have the unenviable responsibility of running the operation. It would be better to postpone it for one year."

Another head of English asked me to ask a question in the House about where the money will come from to pay for all the glossies that are being put out by the Department and SEAC to deal with key stage 3. The answer that I received from the Minister was that it was costing an estimated £1·5 million to publish the glossy magazines dealing with key stage 3 English—yet still we have parents, teachers and governors who say that the system will not work.

Parents in my constituency have written to me. Mrs. Corran wrote:

"Teachers' coursework assessment at the end of this year can provide a reliable form of assessment, as it has done at GCSE level for the past few years,"

Mrs. Hamilton wrote not only that the tests were wrong but that there should be a pilot before compulsory testing was introduced. Parents and teachers have written saying that they are concerned about the way in which the tests are being conducted.

The governors of schools in my constituency have written saying the same. Those of Northbrook Church of England school wrote to the Secretary of State on 31 March. I do not know whether they have received a reply yet; I certainly have not seen a copy of one.

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston): It takes five months.

Mrs. Prentice: My hon. Friend tells me that it takes five months to receive a reply—and even then we cannot guarantee that the spelling will be correct.

The governors of Northbrook school wrote that the governing body had

"assiduously undertaken its duties in implementing the 1988 Education Act and associated legislation. The governors have found much to commend in the underlying principles of the curriculum legislation—but much wanting in the statutory requirements. We are particularly concerned at the inappropriate nature of much of the Key Stage 3 assessment and of its demands on teacher time. We wish to draw your attention to the unacceptably high work load being demanded of teachers and to the derisory pay award made this year in the light of the above demands."

That is not the teachers talking, but the governors—the people who are attempting to run their schools as efficiently and effectively as possible. They feel that they cannot do their job properly because they know that the colleagues whom they have appointed to do the job in the classroom cannot do that job properly.

I shall touch upon one or two other matters that have been raised in the debate. We all understand now that nursery education is the key—if I may use that word—to ensuring that people do well later in their educational lives. In Labour authorities in London we have the highest number of three and four-year-olds in nursery schools and classes. But many boroughs are now having to cut places, funding staffing and support services to meet Government capping limits and to bring their funding more closely into line with the standard spending assessments, in anticipation of the new schools funding methodology.

Yet again the Government tell us that they are committed to nursery education, yet they do nothing about it. In fact, they act in such a way as to ensure that people who want to provide nursery education cannot possibly do so. You might be shocked to know, Madam Deputy Speaker, that in the 14 years since the Government took office, only one extra child in every 100 in London will get a nursery place, despite the Government's so-called respect for education and for our young people.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dewsbury mentioned another matter that especially concerns those of us who represent London constituencies—Home Office funding for section 11. That funding greatly affects the teaching of English in our schools and it has been estimated that reductions in Home Office section 11 grants represent a loss to London of £15 million for 1994-95 and £19 million for 1995-96. Those cuts will cause a decline in language support services, which will lead to a decline in levels of achievement for all pupils. It will disadvantage some groups and the impact will be felt by all.

Section 11 funding supports classes in English for speakers of other languages. That is not a national curriculum subject, so it cannot be adequately supported by mainstream staffing levels. My own borough of Lewisham has expressed concern that, where section 11 funded staff are already spread across several classes, pupil-teacher ratios could worsen to unworkable levels.

We are concerned that cuts in Government support are further destabilising the education system and reducing local education authorities' capacity to implement local and central Government policy. Frequent change in Government education policies is having an enormously damaging effect on London's schools. We need stability so that we can create a climate in which effective learning can take place and regular monitoring can provide opportunities for real evaluation of the need for appropriate change. The words of Mick Levens, the head of English at Forest Hill school, sum up our concerns about Government policy:

"Badly written, poorly researched tests which look at a tiny amount of what a student can do and which will take preference over teacher's assessment, (which would be based on four lessons a week for three years), will be useless and have the potential to do lasting damage. The government will have several goes at getting it right but this time will not come again for our students who deserve much, much better than this."

My hon. Friends and I can only agree with those sentiments.

8.15 pm

Mr. James Pawsey (Rugby and Kenilworth): I know the hon. Member for Lewisham, East (Mrs. Prentice) to be a formidable member of the Select Committee on the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration, and I have seen her tackling witnesses. In full flight she is remarkable, and I pay tribute to her. Like the hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor), she raised the issue of nursery education, and I do not believe that what she said was entirely right.

My hon. Friends will wish to know that the Government have provided about £150 million in additional funding for nursery education this year. That is a substantial sum. More than 90 per cent. of children in the United Kingdom now enjoy some form of pre-school provision; 175,000 more children aged under five attended maintained schools in England in 1991 than in 1979. Those are the facts. I appreciate the importance of nursery education, and my right hon. and hon. Friends in government appreciate it too. The Government have done much to support pre-school education.

My hon. Friends and I should be grateful to the Opposition for providing us with their parliamentary time in which to expose their lack of policies. This debate, like so many others that have preceded it, is about our ideas and our agenda. We have heard from the Opposition the same ritual calls for more money, and more power for the trade unions. Opposition Members continue to oppose tests, excellence and, of course, grant-maintained status. They have no constructive policy, and they would not recognise one if it sprang from the Dispatch Box. Labour is travelling light, with no new ideas, only the same tired discredited dogma.

I have to say——

Mr. Enright: The hon. Gentleman does not have to say it, but he will say it anyway.

Mr. Pawsey: The hon. Member is right. I shall indeed say it, and I shall refer to the hon. Member for Hemsworth (Mr. Enright) in due course; let him be patient.

I have said before in the House that the national curriculum is too prescriptive. There is little doubt that the tests are indeed too complex. Both those aspects should be modified; I do not believe that there is a major dispute between the two sides of the House on those two general points.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, in his admirable speech, acknowledged the fact that some change is necessary. He said that a wide-ranging review would be undertaken by the School Curriculum and Assessment Authority under the chairmanship of Sir Ron Dearing. I have no doubt that following that review the national curriculum and the tests will be substantially amended. I found it interesting, as I am sure my hon. Friends did, that Sir Ron Dearing said two weeks ago that the hands-on experience that will be gained from this year's tests will be invaluable in deciding the format of the new tests for schools in the next academic year. He repeated that point in the weekend press. He clearly sees the benefit to the nation's children of continuing the present testing process.

I have no doubt that the School Curriculum and Assessment Authority will, with the experience that is now being built up, produce an entirely acceptable national curriculum and testing system which will meet the requirements of teachers, pupils and parents. It will be simpler and easier to implement, but sufficiently rigorous to test and to assess children so that subject weaknesses, when identified, can be remedied.

I am concerned—my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Fabricant) made this point during his admirable speech—about some of the statements and comments that we have heard from teacher trade unions at recent conferences. I have long argued in the House that the majority of teachers are dedicated both to their profession and to the children in their charge. I have said for many years in the House that teachers should be adequately remunerated. I am pleased that, as a result of efforts by my right hon. and hon. Friends, the average salary for teachers is now substantially in excess of £20,000 a year. Most teachers earn their pay.

However, I regret certain of the recent statements made by teachers at conferences and I deeply deplore the possibility of a boycott of all tests. That will cause the greatest distress and worry to parents because they know that it will damage their children's education. Children have been preparing for the tests, and for them now to be abandoned would be most frustrating.

The National Union of Teachers has announced that it will ballot its members on whether to boycott all national curriculum tests both this year and next. That is a remarkable decision given the setting up of the SCAA. It is apparent that the NUT is prepared to condemn the SCAA before it has even seen its recommendations. That is not a responsible position for any trade union to adopt.

The NUT boycott would include all existing tests which the independent inspectorate says are raising standards. It is clear that the NUT wants confrontation and not improvement. It opposes any reform because it wants to stay in some 1960s time warp and to return to the permissive and trendy methods that caused the problems in the first place. It wants to go back to the discredited ideas that caused Jim Callaghan to start the great debate on quality and standards in the nation's schools. That point was touched on by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State today.

The NUT's attitude was best summed up by its general secretary saying that he was "delighted to receive a letter from the Prime Minister saying he found the union troublesome."

He then said:

"We will continue to be troublesome for some time".

I suspect—I think that some of my hon. Friends will join me in this belief—that Mr. McAvoy is concerned more with his union's macho image and with his falling membership than he is with the education of the nation's children.

My fears grew when a teacher at the same NUT conference said:

"Testing is the link in the chain. If we break it the whole Conservative education policy goes down the tubes."

Another delegate at the conference said:

"This is not the end of the campaign, it is the beginning, a springboard to fight the Tories on all the other issues."

There we have it. It is out in the open. The argument is not about testing and it is not about educating the nation's children. It is not about education at all. It is about taking on the democratically elected Government of the United Kingdom.

I hope that parents saw on television the teachers' conferences which showed, as no words of mine can show, why a national curriculum and testing system must be in place. I wonder what the majority of hard-working, conscientious teachers felt when they heard the statements made by some of their militant colleagues who are pursuing not so much a classroom dispute, but more a class war.

There are those who mistakenly believe that the Government will cave in to pressure. They are wrong. When the well-being of the nation's children is at stake, there will be no U-turn by my right hon. and hon. Friends in this Administration.

I said at the beginning of my remarks that I understood teachers' frustrations. They naturally want to get on with the job of teaching the nation's children. Teachers well understand the importance of tests, but they resent the amount of time being demanded by the current tests. I have some sympathy with that view. That is why my right hon. Friend is instituting his far-ranging review which will substantially improve the testing system.

I remind the House that not every trade union leader wants the disruption of this year's tests. I read again the comments made by the general secretary of the Association of Teachers and Lecturers, the union of the hon. Member for Hemsworth. I was interested to hear him describe it as the LTA, and I wondered——

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Further and Higher Education (Mr. Tim Boswell): It was dyslexia.

Mr. Pawsey: My hon. Friend accuses the hon. Gentleman of having dyslexia. Having heard him in full flow, I do not believe that he suffers from dyslexia. He may have shortcomings, but dyslexia is not one of them.

I return to the remarks made by Mr. Smith, the general secretary of the Association of Teachers and Lecturers, and I quote his words, which make very good reading. He said:

"Information about examination results is here to stay. Parents are entitled to information about the schools their children attend."

Commenting on my right hon. Friend's commendable decision not to publish the results of this year's English tests for 14-year-olds, Mr. Smith said:

"If English teachers genuinely think the tests are flawed they now have the opportunity to prove it and co-operate in improving them."

[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I am delighted to have the support of my hon. Friends. I will give them even more to cheer about. Mr. Smith then said:

"If they reject that chance, was the concern ever really professional at all?"

Hon. Members should remember that Mr. Smith is the general secretary of one of the principal trade unions, so his viewpoint is important. Parents will naturally give substantial weight to what he says, especially as the overwhelming majority of the nation's parents agree with what he has said.

It is worth while recalling that my right hon. Friend has met the trade unions on 11 occasions. During his first year —this point came out in his excellent speech——

Mr. Enright: The hon. Gentleman has said that several times.

Mr. Pawsey: I will say it three more times because it is worth saying again. My right hon. Friend is a caring Secretary of State who wishes to improve the quality and the standard of state education in which his child is being educated. Opposition Members should always remember that point.

During his first year, the Secretary of State and his ministerial colleagues visited more than 110 schools. As a result of what they learnt from those visits, my right hon. Friend has made two substantial concessions.

Mr. Enright: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Pawsey: I am sorry. I would normally give way to the hon. Gentleman, but, sadly, many of my hon. Friends wish to make important speeches. Therefore, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me if I do not give way.

The first point made by the general secretary of the ATL was that the test results would not be published. The second concession made by my right hon. Friend was to set up the SCAA to review the tests. My right hon. Friend has sought to meet the concern of teachers and the aspirations of parents. He has been successful in his aims.

8.30 pm

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston): As a Member who represents a constituency in the north-west of England, I am not prepared to see children in some parts of the country having to settle for second class education. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I welcome that response from Conservative Members because they acknowledge the words of their leader in the foreword to the "Choice and Diversity" document. I only hope that the Minister remembers that point when people from Cheshire put a logical case to him about the mathematical imbalance of the standard spending assessment as it affects north-west shire counties when we meet in the near future.

I come to this debate not as an expert educationist or an experienced teacher but as a parent of a child who is going through the secondary system—a key stage 3 pupil—and as someone who cares deeply for the children in my constituency of Ellesmere Port and Neston. A wide range of views has been expressed to me by teachers in the constituency.

I wrote at length to Baroness Blatch in mid-February and got a response in April. I was pleased to read in one paragraph:

"We are not insensitive or unaware of the problems being faced by schools. We are always willing to listen to the informed views of those on the ground. Your points will be treated in this light."

I hope that the Minister will listen to my points about a number of aspects.

Early in her letter, Baroness Blatch says:

[Mr. Andrew Miller]

"As you may be aware, there has also been recent concern about the standard of technology education".

As a member of the Information Committee—I can only assume that I was put on that Committee because I have some expertise in the field—I read that sentence with great interest. I also read with great interest the report of the Comptroller and Auditor General on grant-maintained schools in England which was published only a few days ago. The report showed that there is an extreme weakness on the part of the Department for Education in information technology.

In the overall conclusions, three of the four paragraphs —paragraphs 31 to 34 inclusive—criticise the way in which grant-maintained schools, in their activities of running the school administration, fail on information technology. That comes as no surprise because we know that the Department, in its role as the body responsible for education, fails properly to develop information technology in the classroom.

There is an extraordinary statement in the key stage 3 document. It is bizarre. Many of the teachers to whom I have spoken, who are developing information technology in the classroom, also found the statement bizarre. At the end of what, on the face of it, is a well-structured block in the 1993 element, it says:

"The information technology test will be a one hour written test, taken simultaneously by all pupils under controlled conditions. It will take place at 11.30 am on Monday 14th June. Four tiers will be provided covering levels 1-4, 3-6, 5-8 and 7-10. All questions in the test will be compulsory."

Introducing people to information technology is a difficult task in the House, so perhaps some lessons can be learnt from teachers who are dealing with people who are slightly faster on the up-take than perhaps we are. It has been the experience of all participants that the practical hands-on element is especially important. A number of teachers have told me that, in the nine weeks, they have had to draw pupils away from the hands-on experience five weeks into the course. That seems to be an entirely daft way of teaching information technology.

The information technology course is not designed to replace the skills which have been taught in English, mathematics or physics: it is an information technology unit. The unit needs to be reviewed most carefully. I urge the Secretary of State to undertake such a review in the forthcoming weeks and months. To draw pupils away from the hands-on experience is like telling driving students that in the future they will simply be tested on the highway code and they can learn the practical hands-on bits later. That is the wrong approach, and I hope that the Secretary of State will take that in the spirit in which it is intended.

Another aspect of technology relates to design and technology—many of us used to call it woodwork and cookery. Some interesting concepts are being developed in that unit. The Secretary of State must question whether the notion that the continuous process from original thought through to manufacture and evolution, which in itself is extremely valuable, does not overly burden teachers who in the past would have spent more time teaching pupils about the hands-on skills of penmanship or mixing ingredients or using hand tools in the various components of the tests.

It is interesting to note that in practical terms—I have come across such situations and, indeed, this happened to my daughter—the complications facing teachers this year have resulted in pupils being entered into the wrong tiers for the testing process. When it was eventually recognised that pupils could have been entered into a higher tier, it was too late because there was no classroom time remaining.

Let me refer to the English part of the debate. I must acknowledge that, like the right hon. Member for Brent, North (Sir R. Boyson), I also failed the 11-plus test. [Interruption.] I do not want to hear any comments from Members on the Government Front Bench. We also have whiskers in common. I studied English at school. Perhaps I did not study it as well as some of the great scholars around me, but I learnt to appreciate wonderful literature, especially the works of Shakespeare.

The difference between the process of education now and the process that prevailed then is that then it was common practice for pupils to be taken regularly to see Shakespeare live to learn about it, feel it and enjoy it. I am afraid to say that that happens all too infrequently today. When it does, it requires a parental payment which is prohibitive to people in the poorer parts of our community. If the Secretary of State genuinely intends to make the process of education open to all parts of the community, he must address that point more seriously. It would be a tragedy if literature and the arts were left to an elite few in our community.

A broader brush approach has been taken tonight on matters which have impacted on us as a result of the Education Bill. Many hon. Members will have seen a letter from the director of Music for Youth in the past few days. He said:

"The Education Bill will, I believe, bring about a diminution in the quality and range of this aspect of music teaching in our schools. Whilst I am certain this is not the intention of the Bill, it will be one of its side effects."

In parallel with my comments about the theatre, I genuinely believe that those risks face us. I urge the Secretary of State in undertaking the review to examine them most carefully. If not, one might be tempted to quote "The Merchant of Venice". The hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Fabricant) indulged in many literary quotes, so why shouldn't I?

"The man that hath no music in himself,
Nor is mov'd with concord of sweet sounds,
Is fit for treasons, stratagems, and spoils;
The motions of his spirit are as dull as night,
And his affections dark as Erebus:
Let no such man be trusted".

I invite the Secretary of State to think most carefully about his handling of the debate.

Mr. Dowd: How does my hon. Friend think that the Secretary of State got where he is?

Mr. Miller: I leave that for the House to decide.

I conclude by inviting the Secretary of State to examine the scale of changes that he is imposing on teachers and head teachers in the system. The scale of the changes is having an enormous impact on the ability of schools to deal with them in a cohesive manner. There are simply too many changes and they are happening too quickly.

One of the schools in my constituency was referred to in Baroness Blatch's letter. She said that it had given helpful and thoughtful comments. I asked it to give me a list of documents that it has received recently. It produced a list of documents received since September 1992. The teachers identified 19 major documents within half an hour this morning. No one undertook a detailed search for every last one. The 19 documents began with the White Paper "Choice and Diversity" in August and went through to the most recent English anthology, which it received in February. Over and above that, it received 17 glossy books on assessment arrangements for key stage 3.

I say in all honesty to the Secretary of State that every school in my constituency with which I have had contact and discussed the impact of the changes with staff, teachers, head teachers, parents and governors has told me that the change is happening too quickly, that it is not being controlled and that some fresh thought needs to be given to how the schools are supposed to introduce the changes and resource them in terms of professional staff time.

I suppose that a step in the right direction was taken when the statement was made that English and technology results would not be included in the schools performance tables until 1994. I guess that for that we can be grateful. But again, lessons could have been learnt from mathematics and science in the past year. No one is against change in education. No one is against ensuring that every pupil has the best chance that we can offer as a society. But I urge the Secretary of State to listen carefully to the remarks that have been made in the debate. Some fundamental changes could take place for the benefit of the consumer—the pupil—with some significant changes on the Secretary of State's part. He must take a step back and rethink his position.

8.45 pm

Mr. Alan Haselhurst (Saffron Walden): I shall not follow the hon. Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Mr. Miller) down his literary path. I shall return to the not very poetic terms of the motion, which says that "the current difficulties and instability associated with Key Stage testing are caused by the Secretary of State".

That betrays a great deal of flawed thinking. It has already been said that introducing the national curriculum and associated tests is by its very nature a complex exercise. It would be surprising if adjustments did not have to be made and we did not have to rethink as we went along in order to get it right. We have attempted the task over very few years, so, of necessity, changes and amendments will have to be made. That cannot be said to be the fault of the current Secretary of State.

When one boils it down, the real problem that has brought us to the difficulties that we face in our schools stem from key stage 3 tests in English and technology. I do not know what the Labour party is about in the debate. [HON. MEMBERS: "Nor does it."] I do not know whether the motion is simply intended to make mischief. The hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor) referred to guinea pigs twice in her speech and also used the term on Radio 4 this morning. She also accused the Government of confrontation.

However, anything new that is tried in schools, whoever inspires it, is bound to involve the children on the receiving end in those schools being guinea pigs. I do not see why the term should be pejorative and why it should be used against the Government who introduced those reforms. Clearly, the pupils on the receiving end of those reforms are the first to experience them. Nor do we confront schools if we present new ideas. The nation has willed us to make changes because it shares our perception that education standards are not as good as they should be.

The hon. Member for Dewsbury dissimulated considerably about what she meant by tests. The sentence in the Labour motion which I quoted refers to key stage testing, but not to any part of it. Only later in the motion are key stage 3 tests in English and technology referred to specifically. Throughout her speech the hon. Lady did not distinguish between key stage tests. So she appeared to join in the condemnation of the tests as a whole which several of the teaching unions have expressed. She did not make her position clear. I hope that the country will take note of her apparent sweeping condemnation of the reforms that are being attempted.

What is the real position? There are four strands to the argument. There is the question of key stage 3 tests in English and technology. There is the question of tests as a whole. There is the question of the use to which tests are put. And then there is a general assault on Government policy.

I do not believe that the broad mass of professional teachers in this country are pursuing a political agenda. Some are—my hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) referred to that—and the nation heard some of the contributions to the conference of the National Union of Teachers. Certainly, lurking in the background there is a political campaign being fought, but that is not of interest to the vast mass of teachers, certainly not in my constituency.

We should acknowledge that there is misgiving about league tables and the use to which tests are put. My right hon. Friend the Member for Mitcham and Morden (Dame A. Rumbold) made the point that of course these things are there as a measure of performance of schools, and why should they not be? But, fair enough, that is an area of discussion and controversy and we must recognise that not all teachers are happy about it.

It is more difficult to establish whether people, professionals or other, are for or against tests as such. We heard conflicting remarks from the hon. Member for Dewsbury. Was she or was she not for them, because she seemed to be in favour of her kind of tests but not in favour of anybody else's? However, it seems to me that these tests have been proceeding perfectly well, although not, perhaps, in the literal sense of "perfectly". We have made good progress with the implementation of the tests for seven-year-olds. There were difficulties to start with, but they have been bedding down quite well and we have been gaining valuable information from them. The trial of the 11-year-old tests is proceeding satisfactorily, as I understand it. The tests at key stage 3 in maths and science are also proceeding reasonably well. It is the opinion of one of the schools in my constituency that the tests will be a valid and reliable indicator of pupils' achievements towards the national curriculum. So I do not believe that the debate is about maths and science at key stage 3.

We come back to English and technology at key stage 3. We should acknowledge that there is considerable misgiving among many teachers about the content of these two subject tests.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has made two important concessions in this respect. Early in February I had a group of people from one of the schools in my constituency to see me; it was made up of governors and senior staff. They said that, if the Secretary of State could be persuaded that the tests might go ahead this year, but the results should not be published, it would be a reasonable compromise. It was a compromise that they urged on me.

Well, without particularly listening to me my right hon. Friend, on 19 February, made that very concession. I do not believe that that group of governors and teachers was unique, so clearly there are many governors and teachers who believe that the Secretary of State made the right gesture on that occasion. He has gone further than that and said that there should be a review of the national curriculum and the content of these tests for a future year.

I believe that those two gestures on the part of the Secretary of State deserve a degree of reciprocity by the teachers, particularly when reinforced by the statement of Sir Ron Dearing, who is to conduct the review of these tests, that the evidence that he believes that he will get will be valuable in determining what happens in the future. What is now required is a step back, not by the Government, but by the teachers.

The teachers would, I believe, cut a more impressive figure with parents if they carefully distinguished their position. If they said to parents throughout the country that they believed in the national curriculum, subject to discussion about its future evolution, that they believed in tests, subject to discussion on getting the context exactly right; that they were quite happy to proceed with the tests for seven-year-olds and the trial of 11-year-old tests, and to pursue the maths and science at key stage 3—which apparently there is evidence to show is supported by the teaching profession—they might sound more credible on the subject of English and technology. It might be easier for us then to meet them on that particular point, which is clearly one of real and acknowledged difficulty.

We have said that there will be a review, so the only question is whether the tests should go ahead this year as a source of evidence for next year. Surely that is not a great chasm for teachers to jump. It would be a worthwhile gesture in response to the Secretary of State to convince all the parents in the country that teachers are as committed as anyone else to the national curriculum and a system of tests with it. I believe that, if teachers can be satisfied that my right hon. Friend is genuine in his desire to hear their views on the correction of the content of English and technology at key stage 3, and for them to be involved, as my hon. Friend the Member for Crosby (Sir M. Thornton) suggests, that could be a way forward that would ensure that there was peace and stability in our schools this summer.

Dr. Tony Wright (Cannock and Burntwood): I get more depressed in the House listening to debates on education than on anything else. I get depressed on many other things, too, but I get depressed on education in particular. This debate has typified what happens at every education question time. It fills me with total dismay about what is happening to the education system in this country.

A debate such as this should be an occasion for celebration. When the British House of Commons discusses the education system, it should be an occasion to celebrate it, to laud it, to talk—as some of my hon. Friends tried to—about what education is all about, its excitement, the joys of discovery and the vision that it brings. We hear nothing of this. We hear only about the machinery, the mechanics. We have lost sight completely of what we should really be talking about. I hope that the point that we have reached now is a warning to us that we can no longer go on in this way.

I am not talking only to the Conservative party; I am talking to us all. If we go on talking in the way that we have been, we will be doing a massive and permanent disservice to the education system and to the children in it.

We are all allowed a few autobiographical words, and perhaps I can say mine. I spent a lot of time in the middle and late 1980s when the education reforms of this Government were coming on stream, working with school governors and trying to arouse their enthusiasm about what might be possible. I have always been a great advocate of greater parental involvement in education. I had opposed the teaching unions when they were very resistant to involving parents in school government. I thought that I spoke for parents in this. Governors were excited about what was happening and so were parents. We wanted to see more power come to the school level, to empower parents. We believed in all that. We wanted to measure results, to drive up standards and to improve the standing of teachers.

There I was trying to arouse their enthusiasm, but they also had worries—for instance, about the national curriculum. They asked if it would mean the nationalisation of the system. The answer was that it might, but assurances were being given that it would not be like that; it would just be a structure within which they could operate and explore, retaining the essence of what education was about. There were worries about the formula funding. Would it penalise certain schools against others? We were told that it would not.

There were particular worries about the impact of testing. It used to be called assessment. We were told at that time that it would not be called testing as that would be to misunderstand its very nature; it would be called assessment and it was to be a servant of the curriculum. The worry was that the relationship would be turned round and the system would be driven by testing rather than by the curriculum. We were told that it was a false worry and that it would not be like that.

We have now reached the pont where all those hopes and enthusiasms have been dissipated. I speak quite genuinely as someone who was enthusiastic about much of what was happening. Teachers are completely demoralised, parents are completely dismayed and governors are packing up in droves because the system has been kicked away from under them.

We have to ask what went wrong, as something clearly has gone wrong, and how it could have been allowed to happen. My answer, and I believe it to be genuine, is that what has happened is the total politicisation of the system. What was originally an education agenda has turned out to be a political agenda for education. That was what went wrong. It is the only way to explain the history of those years.

Why else were people put in to run the system found to be unacceptable and booted out? What happened in 1991 when the then Minister replaced Duncan Graham from the National Curriculum Council and Philip Halsey from the Schools Examination and Assessment Council with someone who the Government thought would be okay, an oil executive who turned out not to be okay and had to be sacked because he did not deliver the goods?

The story continues with the curriculum committee being packed with people who were politically okay and often associated with the Centre for Policy Studies—that is the entry point into the system.

Politicising the system destroys all confidence and trust in it among all those associated with it from teachers, who Conservative Members clearly do not like, to parents, governors and everyone else in the educational process. We have now reached crisis point. I take no pleasure in saying that. It is a defeat and a quite unnecessary one as it need never have happened.

In the middle and late 1980s there was a consensus in the making that would have driven up education standards on a unified basis. The word used then was partnership. That has been totally destroyed. Hon. Members must remember Professor Brian Cox—the great "black papers" author. I agreed with much of what he said then. I felt that we had gone wrong in the primary sector, that teaching had slipped and that we needed more rigorous standards. Professor Cox, formerly chairman of the National Curriculum English Working Group, said earlier this month:

"During the next few months the national curriculum in England and Wales may totally collapse. Great harm will be inflicted on children in state schools. Children in independent schools will find themselves at a considerable advantage, for their teachers are free to reject narrow and muddled national curriculum requirements."

It is a system in crisis and chaos. Those are the words not of the Labour party, but of the friends of the Conservative party, the people who have tried to work the system and to believe in it. They are saying that we have reached a point of chaos and collapse.

The question now is what on earth we do about it. I am against all boycotts. I am particularly against those people who boycott consensus, consultation and common sense. It is exactly that. The politicisation and the political agenda for education has produced the present crisis.

I ask only this. Given the fact that we are doing an enormous disservice to the system and to everyone in it, the more I hear the political knockabout that is going on in debates such as this one, the more depressed I am about getting the chance to do anything about it unless we now decide seriously to stop playing politics with the system, with English, with history and above all with children. I should like the Minister to say—and I say this more in hope than expectation—that he has learnt all that and he is about to offer a new partnership that can stop all the nonsense that is going on at the moment.

9.4 pm

Mr. Bob Dunn (Dartford): I listened with great amazement to the speech of the hon. Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Dr. Wright). I have never heard such unmitigated drivel in my 14 years in the House. He said, "Stop playing politics with children" but that is what the Labour party has done for 30 years—it abolished the direct grant and grammar schools, it closed down good high schools, created neighbourhood schools and opposed the assisted places scheme. He forgets that we have been down this route before, to the same destination, time after time in education debates, whether to do with legislation or on a Supply day.

I have a strong suspicion that, when the shadow Cabinet comes to review today, it will regard it as rather a waste of time. It has been an empty day for the Opposition—their Benches have been empty and people have been dragooned in to speak at the last minute. A list of eminent Conservative speakers are down to follow me —and for that reason I will be brief.

Labour Members have offered no new ideas but simply repeat the ideas of the 1960s, '70s, '80s, and '90s, all of which stem from the 1960s. I am sad beyond belief that, although in every other area of policy the Labour party has twisted, turned and turned again to fashion a policy for the electorate, in this area of education it has not changed one atom in 40 years. That is why I am surprised that the Labour party has the nerve to choose this subject for debate on a Supply day. How bogus; what cant; what hypocrisy.

It all stems from the "great debate" of the noble Lord Callaghan. He started that debate for no other reason than the pressure from the Conservative party at the time and the success of the black papers written by my right hon. Friend the Member for Brent, North (Sir R. Boyson). We had the great Ruskin college speech, and then we had nothing. We had nothing for years, yet we had anarchy in our schools, the winter of discontent, and ever since then the bleating of the Labour party.

I thought that the speech of the hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor) was bizarre—there is no other word to describe it. Where is she? She should be here listening to me. It was immensely bizarre. She did not answer questions. I thought it was just me who thought that she did not answer questions—that it was some sort of cultural or psychological block—and then I discovered an eminent article in the Evening Standard of 15 April entitled "How Mrs. Ann Taylor avoided the question." She ought to have read it. Perhaps she knows about it. If she does not, the new custom is not to tell people across the Floor of the House but to send it to them after the debate in an envelope. Perhaps she will do the same, if she can find the stamps, and tell us, after the event, what she might have said if she had said it.

What hypocrisy we have from the Labour party these days. At one time, it stood for something. In the 1950s, it stood for something; when Eric Heffer was here, it stood for something. It now stands for nothing. It is bland, boring and futile.

The Labour party talks about stability. What about the instability that it would cause to those districts in Kent where we enjoy grammar schools, city technology colleges and high schools? What about playing politics with the children of Kent and other areas where parents vote, year after year, to retain a selective system of secondary education? The Labour party says we should have a referendum or a ballot in schools. It can have a ballot any time it likes in Dartford on selective schools. It will be won time and time again by those who believe that selective education is a good thing for Kent.

In the debate on 3 March I asked the hon. Member for Dewsbury:

"If the hon. Lady was Secretary of State for Education and wanted to close grammar schools in my constituency of Dartford, and if the people of Dartford voted in a referendum not to have those schools closed, what would she do? Would she keep them open or close them?"—[Official Report, 3 March 1993; Vol. 220, c. 385.]

What was the answer? There was no answer. The traditional practice of the Labour party is not to answer questions. It refers only to the image makers—let us see if they are happy with what is proposed. I challenge the Labour party to come clean.

We decided to take the route of the national curriculum not because we had lost faith in all local authorities, although we had in some, or because of some centre for policy study's notion, but because the great consensus of the past, to which my right hon. Friend the Member for Brent, North referred, had collapsed. The secret garden of the curriculum had been invaded by the left—by the pursuit of gay studies, lesbian rights, anti-police, anti-business and anti-capitalist studies. We had to move in. We had to take action to rescue the nation's children from the left, many members of which are still sitting on the Opposition Benches.

Labour Members talk about money. If money was everything, ILEA, which spent more than any other education authority in the country, would have come top in the examination results. In the event, it was top in expenditure and bottom in examination results. My goodness, I was glad when I abolished the ILEA.

I urge my right hon. Friend to continue the pursuit of what he has started. We need to measure performance within the national curriculum. Only by testing can we evaluate the work that we have done in the interests of the nation's children. About 95 per cent. of the population educate their children in local authority or grant-maintained schools. We have a duty and obligation to make sure that we educate them to the best of our ability. I wish my right hon. Friend every success in his policies.

Ms Helen Jackson (Sheffield, Hillsborough): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak in the debate, because I am anxious to relate the motion, and particularly the elements that refer to the centralising nature of the Secretary of State's performance, to the way in which the whole issue of education is bubbling up in my constituency.

There is great interest in the subject in Hillsborough now, because we are faced with the potential closure of five schools, four primary and one secondary. That threat brings home to the children, parents and teachers—and it certainly brings home to me, their representative here—just what a school means to all concerned in an area. My postbag has been overflowing with letters from constituents about those schools.

To discover the reasoning behind the proposed closures, I questioned the Secretary of State. After all, he is responsible for setting the standards by which LEAs make the choices available to them. He must spell out the standard of quality that he expects schools to achieve. I have been extremely disappointed by his lack of response.

I asked the right hon. Gentleman to say what standards he expects from LEAs faced with restructuring programmes at the schools in their areas. I expected him to tell me what he required of LEAs, for example, in the context of propping up their educational needs programmes. I expected him to spell out what LEAs should do to protect nursery places in their restructuring programmes and to detail the facilities, including books and equipment, that should be provided.

I did not receive any satisfactory answers from the Secretary of State. On one issue alone, that of special needs, he said that he was expecting an equal number of places to be provided in schools. He did not say when he expected that to be achieved. He did not even say whether there would be a gap of a few years.

There is no requirement that nursery places should be protected at all costs. There is no requirement to provide books and equipment. Many of us have seen the provision of books and equipment become increasingly dependent on the financial wherewithal of the parents. In schools where parents can raise money to provide them, books and equipment are available. In schools where the parents do not have the necessary financial means, provision is increasingly difficult.

The issue on which I have taken greatest exception to the non-reply from the Secretary of State is school size, and, more importantly, class size. When I have asked about the maximum class size for satisfactory education at primary and secondary level, the answer has been that there is no maximum size. If teachers are asked whether the number of children in their care makes a difference, they will say that of course it does. In Sheffield, the local authority has had good pupil-teacher ratios over the years. Therefore, it has been penalised, with a rounding down of standards under the Secretary of State. Demoralisation among professional teaching staff is significant, and will do nothing for the quality of education.

Hon. Members have referred to their experience in education. When I was a teacher, I specialised in teaching children with special needs at infant, junior and secondary levels. I dealt particularly with children who were slower at learning to read than others in their age group. The point that came home to me strongly, particularly at secondary level with children who had failed constantly at junior and infant levels, was the need to raise their self expectation. To do that, it was crucial that they were not faced with rigid testing which categorised them from first to 30th in the class, because they would have been towards the bottom, year in, year out. Such children needed to be tested frequently in a sensitive way so that they could be offered encouragement continually.

The same is true of teachers. They should be encouraged to care about the status of the profession. Understanding the contribution they can make to education policy is the core of creating a good education system.

Mr. Roy Hughes (Newport, East): The hon. Member for Dartford (Mr. Dunn) referred to the Ruskin college speech of Lord Callaghan when he was Prime Minister. I was present that day when Lady Williams, as she is now, was Secretary of State for Education. My hon. Friend will remember that that was towards the end of the period of office of the Labour Government. Since then, we have had 14 years of Conservative government. What have they done about the problems which Lord Callaghan cited?

Ms Jackson: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's intervention. It has been said that standards are low and we cannot be complacent. Of course we cannot, and we should be asking what has happened to the core elements of teaching, which would encourage the standards to rise. Instead, the heavy hand of centralisation has caused a rounding down of standards. What has happened to the qualitative nature of teaching? There has been a continuous rounding down of the status of teaching and teachers in this country.

If teachers are perpetually told that they are asking for too much money, should not be listened to, and know less about the curriculum and the process of teaching than the Secretary of State, it is no wonder that the core element of our education system has declined. I welcomed the approach taken by teachers over the Easter holiday, when they decided to make a stand for their profession. I feel profoundly that that will be to the benefit of the education system and the educational future of our children.

I know that the Front-Bench speakers want to wind up, so I shall finish on the issue with which I started my speech: the intense concern felt by my constituents about school closures. The pupils in one of the primary schools in my constituency have sung a song and put it on tape. They asked me as their Member of Parliament and the councillors on the local council to play the tape in our cars as we drive around. I do not play it continuously and I shall not sing it now, but the final verse of the song goes something like this:

"Dear Mrs Councillor"—

it was addressed to the chair of the education committee—

"it makes us sad
When we think of the good education we've had,
Though politics and money have had their say
But it's our education you are throwing away."

That reflects the feeling of the children in Wharncliffe Side primary school—[Interruption.] That is why we must treat today's debate seriously.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): I must remind hon. Members that sedentary interventions are to be deplored.

9.22 pm

Mr. Patrick Thompson (Norwich, North): I was interested to hear the contribution of the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Ms Jackson), who was one of a number of teachers who have participated in today's debate. I am an ex-teacher, and taught for 23 years before entering Parliament. I believe that today's debate has been a failure for the Opposition. The hon. Member for Hillsborough talked about attendance, but the attendance of Opposition Members has been appalling when one considers that this is supposed to be a major debate for them to put forward their education policies.

I have sat through almost all the debate and heard virtually no new ideas or policies on education from Opposition Members. The hon. Member for Hillsborough, who I know is an ex-teacher, talked about complacency. There is nothing more complacent than the motion that the Opposition have tabled. My colleagues have explained why it is a complacent and destructive motion, and I have to say to the hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor) that the Opposition exercise has failed and been disappointing in many ways.

I was once a member of the ATL. I forgive the hon. Member for Hemsworth (Mr. Enright), who unfortunately is not in his place, for forgetting that it is the ATL and thinking that it is the LTA, because it has changed its name four times during my professional career—I make no criticism of that. Various teachers' unions have been mentioned, and I should at this stage declare my interest in and connection and work with the Professional Association of Teachers.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden (Mr. Haselhurst) that many teachers are not in favour of industrial action or a boycott. I think that I am right in saying that one Opposition Member, the hon. Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Dr. Wright), had the guts to speak out against the idea of a boycott. But the Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen have been rolled over into supporting industrial action and a boycott, and that is an abdication of their responsibility.

The hon. Member for Dewsbury spoke a little about the background to the problems of the national curriculum and testing, and she was right to do so. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has acknowledged the problems by announcing a review, but I do not share the hon. Lady's analysis. She has not given a correct analysis of the problem, nor has she provided a solution.

However, there is concern, as several of my hon. Friends have confirmed, and as has my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, among responsible teachers and head teachers about the amount of bureaucracy in and the complexity of the national curriculum and testing. The one positive message that has come out of the teachers' Easter conferences took the form of a photograph, which some hon. Members will have seen, of a supermarket trolley loaded with documents on the national curriculum and testing.

Hon. Members on both sides of the House will share my concern, and the concern that has been expressed by others, at the amount of bureaucracy and complexity that has crept into the system. I know that my right hon. Friend recognises that, and that is why there is to be a review. However, I am convinced that the support of Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen for a boycott is unwise, ill-advised and an abdication of their responsibility.

My right hon. Friend was good enough to promote me to headmaster earlier, but I was proud, for 23 years, to be a classroom sixth form teacher. I was a supporter of those of my colleagues who, in their heart of hearts, know that in the teaching profession industrial action is never justified. I suspect that that is true of the majority of classroom teachers. Strike action is never justified. The idea of a boycott of testing on the curriculum is never justified, even though, as I have done, it is perfectly possible to criticise the system as it now is and support the Secretary of State in his declared intention to review it.

The teaching profession is in many ways a secure profession. I support the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Dafis) who reminded us that teaching is not easy, that it can be stressful and tiring. It is also a responsible profession, so there is no justification for industrial action or strike action. That is why I support my hon. Friends and those Opposition Members who have had the guts to speak out against that attitude on the part of the Opposition.

The thrust of the Government's education reforms has been successful. Devolution of responsibility to the schools, governors and head teachers is working out well. I know that from visiting schools in my constituency, when parents express appreciation of their increased choice. The Government's aim of achieving higher standards, which is the whole purpose of reforming the national curriculum —but of which the Opposition have lost sight—is popular, recognised and supported.

[Mr. Patrick Thompson]

The introduction of a teachers' pay review body, which I wholeheartedly support, is another step towards helping the profession to be respected, professional and successful, and to achieve high standards.

I support the Government's amendment. The debate has been a total failure for members of the Opposition Front Bench, and I am totally opposed to boycotting—even though one recognises the need for continual change and reform.

9.30 pm

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend): The speeches by Conservative Members can be categorised under the heading of great myths of our time. Many of their remarks could not even be described as half truths. The hon. Member for Dartford (Mr. Dunn) bemoaned the closure of so many grammar schools, supposedly by Labour, when the fact is that Lady Thatcher closed more of them than anyone else. Such misinformation was typical of the presentations of Conservative Members this evening.

When the public see part of this debate on television or read of it in their newspapers, I hope that they will plainly realise the contribution made by my hon. Friends the Members for City of Durham (Mr. Steinberg), for Birmingham, Yardley (Ms Morris), for Nottingham, South (Mr. Simpson), for Lewisham, East (Mrs. Prentice), for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Mr. Miller), for Cannock and Burntwood (Dr. Wright), for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Ms Jackson) and for Eccles (Miss Lestor). [HON MEMBERS: "Where are they?"] Their speeches reflected much better the mood of the teaching profession, parents and governors towards the crisis——

Mr. Dunn: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Would it be possible to suspend the sitting to allow Labour Members to return to the Chamber?

Madam Speaker: That is not a point of order, but I notice an absence of hon. Members at the conclusion of this debate. It is to be deprecated that hon. Members who participated in the debate are not present.

Mr. Griffiths: I realise that Government Members do not like home truths about our schools, but teachers are disillusioned and their morale is low. Parents are concerned and dismayed at the way in which the Government persist in thrusting down the throats of pupils a system of testing that needs to be improved far beyond the promises of the Secretary of State.

In newspapers and in the letters that right hon. and hon. Members receive, demands for change and improvement far outnumber expressions of satisfaction at the way in which the national curriculum is currently implemented. There is a crisis of confidence and things have been turned on their head.

The right hon. Member for Mole Valley (Mr. Baker) made a speech earlier, but has obviously been waylaid on his way back to the Chamber. On Second Reading of the Bill which became the Education Act 1988, he said:

"We do not intend to lay down how lessons should be taught, how timetables should be organised, or which textbooks should be used."—[Official Report, 1 December 1987; Vol. 123, c. 774.]

In the case of the first and the last, however, that is exactly what is happening. We wait with trepidation for the delivery of instructions as to how the timetable itself should be organised. Things have gone badly wrong, as my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock and Burntwood pointed out.

Mr. George Walden (Buckingham): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Griffiths: The hon. Gentleman arrived in the Chamber just over 10 minutes ago. I will not give way to him.

There is a crisis of confidence. At a conference on design and technology management in South Glamorgan, curriculum leaders and heads of technology from 24 of the 26 schools in the county expressed grave disquiet about the nature, management and interpretation of key stage 3 SATs and long tasks. It was strongly felt that SATs were radically interfering with good course work, to the detriment of pupils' education.

Another teacher—the Southampton teacher referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor) who has been a member of the Conservative party since 1976—said:

"The 'goal posts' have been moved around almost weekly and you"— that is, the Secretary of State—

"must not be surprised to hear that senior professionals are concluding that there is little quality thinking being applied by the DFE before statements are made. Decisions are simply being dumped on schools for teachers to try and sort out and make some sense of for their pupils."

The verdict in almost any paper on any day of the week—not only that of teachers, but that of others involved in education—is damning. According to John Sutton, general secretary of the Secondary Heads Association:

"In English, the tests have produced real problems for many schools, not just because there was no pilot programme and the administrators at SEAC made a dog's breakfast of getting out clear and accurate information early enough, but because the assessment tail is now seen to be wagging the curriculum dog."

Even David Pascall, chairman of the National Curriculum Council—who is soon to retire—said:

"the fact remains that the national curriculum at primary level is overloaded and that quality and depth of teaching is being sacrificed in order to achieve the necessary curriculum coverage."

The Ofsted report—which the Government cite in their amendment as supporting their changes—has been much quoted, but those quotations have been very selective. Its press release was entitled "Mixed Progress In The National Curriculum And Assessment Reported By Ofsted". In that press release, it said that the impact of assessment in the national curriculum could "lead to a distortion of the positive relationship between teaching, learning and assessment".

It went on to say:

"This year, however, and for the first time, the benefits and costs are finely balanced. There are some clearly discernible signs that the impact of 'teaching to the test' and the complexities of the assessment requirements could lead to this distortion."

I could go on and on.

Brian Cox had this to say:

"Teachers are not against testing, but the new tests will result in bad teaching. And the new . . . curriculum will be disastrous for children: it goes back to ways of teaching that failed in the past and its ideas about English language are untrue."

Whether we are talking about head teachers who have got together in their own national committee on learning and assessment or about classroom teachers who are concerned about what is happening in schools, the fact remains that teachers are committed—whatever happens in this year's ballots—to ensuring that children are taught more, and that they will be tested and that the result of those tests will be reported to parents.

Furthermore, all the teacher unions have offered to talk to the Secretary of State for Education about ways to get out of this impasse and to make sure that there will be intelligent assessment and testing of children this year. They welcome the review, but they say clearly that the tests are flawed.

The Leeds university study showed that, if anything, there were three clear advantages to be seen in the tests. First, it is an advantage for a child to be born in the winter. Secondly, it is an advantage for a child to be born a girl. Thirdly, it is an advantage for a child to have attended a nursery school. I do not expect the Secretary of State for Education to do anything about making sure that children are born in the winter, or that they are born girls, but I should like him to respond to the evidence that nursery education is good for children by making sure that resources are provided for it. The millions of pounds that he and his predecessors spent upon introducing city technology colleges would have been much better invested in expanding nursery education and making sure that all children, before going to school, have the opportunity to take advantage of nursery education.

Dame Angela Rumbold: Can the hon. Gentleman tell us, in answer to this interesting debate, what the Opposition's proposals on testing are?

Mr. Griffiths: There is a simple and straightforward answer to that question. We believe—we refer to it in our motion—that the Department of Education and the Welsh Office should follow the example of the Scottish Office. That is the simple way forward. If the Welsh Office and the Department for Education were to adopt the Scottish model, there would be sweetness and light, as in a flash of lightning.

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: I am sure that my hon. Friend will be delighted to join me in congratulating Members of the other place on defeating the Government on the first day of their consideration of the Education Bill by supporting a Labour amendment, which means that there will have to be somebody on the funding council with expertise in special educational needs.

Mr. Griffiths: I am very pleased to hear that. We pressed in this place for that provision to be made, but the Government remained implacably opposed to it.

The chaos created over key stage 3 English has been further underlined by the differences between the Department for Education and the National Curriculum Council and the Welsh Office and the Curriculum Council for Wales. In press releases and letters to the chairman of the two bodies, the Secretary of State for Education admitted that it was novel for his curriculum proposals to be based directly on the advice of the council rather than on those of the curriculum subject working group. However, the Curriculum Council for Wales went out of its way to point out that "The Curriculum Council for Wales has consulted with the profession in Wales and has involved Council members and its English Committee in the shaping of its advice. Members of these Committees include head teachers, primary and secondary teachers, LEA advisers, lecturers in further and higher education and representatives from industry and training organisations."

I appeal to the Welsh Office to ensure that sufficient copies of the document from the Curriculum Council for Wales are distributed to all the schools in England so that teachers in England may have the same opportunity as teachers in Wales to read it.

Finally, I appeal to the Secretary of State for Education to listen to some words that Oliver Cromwell spoke in the House exactly 340 years ago today, on 20 April 1653, to the parliamentarians of that day:

"You have sat too long here for any good you have been doing. Depart, I say, and let us have done with you."

9.45 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Schools (Mr. Eric Forth): A casual observer of the debate might find it difficult to believe that this is, or has been, an Opposition day. It would have been confusing to anyone who did not know the House and its ways and who had come here expecting some sort of fireworks on a day selected by the Opposition and on a subject of their choice. The Opposition would have been expected not only to criticise the Government, but perhaps to give us an inkling of their policies. Yet in the House today we have seen a Chamber almost empty on the Opposition side and we have heard lacklustre Opposition contributions, without any positive ideas or thoughts. The debate has been pathetically poorly attended by Opposition Members. That may suggest the extent of the Opposition's commitment to education policy; indeed, it sums that up extremely well. In contrast, there have been distinguished and scintillating contributions from my right hon. Friends the Members for Mole Valley (Mr. Baker), for Mitcham and Morden (Dame A. Rumbold) and for Brent, North (Sir R. Boyson), to name but three distinguished former Education Ministers.

That being said, it might be slightly surprising if I were to tell the House that some common ground has been exhibited in the debate. For example, everybody supported the concept of a national curriculum. Everyone tells us that they support the concepts of testing and assessment. Indeed, even the education trade unions say the same. The general secretaries of all six teaching unions signed a letter to the Secretary of State on 9 February which affirmed:

"we are not opposed to testing".

In a letter to Members of Parliament dated 16 March, Mr. de Gruchy of the NAS/UWT wrote:

"I wish to reiterate the Association's support for testing and assessment procedures".

In a letter dated 15 April Mr. McAvoy of the NUT said:

"The National Union of Teachers is not against assessment and testing".

There must be an answer to that apparent conundrum; there must be a catch somewhere. Of course, the catch is this: Conservatives believe in testing, but by that we mean relevant and effective testing. For example, testing should be standard in its approach, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Mitcham and Morden said; it should be fitted to the curriculum, as my hon. Friend the Member for Dartford (Mr. Dunn) said; it should be objective, reliable and informative to parents and teachers; and it should be transparent and reported regularly and openly to parents whenever it takes place. In other words, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Brent, North said, testing is designed to ensure that schools are doing their job. That is the object of the exercise. That is the form of testing in which we believe.

By contrast, it appears that Opposition Members, while paying lip service to the concept of testing, are content with the traditional approach, as they would call it, by which teachers assess their own work in their own classrooms and make their own judgment of what their pupils have done. That is not acceptable. It gives rise to inconsistency and it means——

Mr. Hall: I shall not use this evening the example of Scotland. Instead, I have a question for the Minister. Is he familiar with the Neale reading analysis and with the National Foundation for Educational Research mathematics test? They are criteria reference assessments which teachers have used for a long time. It is not their own judgment at all.

Mr. Forth: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point. I am sure that some teachers have used those tests; probably the better teachers have used them. The real difficulty is what the not-so-good teachers are doing. How can we assume that teachers who are inexperienced or not very good at their job—there may be some of them out there—are assessing their pupils? How can they give information to parents about what the pupils are doing?

Throughout the debate, Opposition Members have been in some difficulty and I shall give two or three examples. They allege that there is instability in the education system, yet it is Opposition Members who support a boycott that is designed precisely to render the education system unstable. Surely that is the most disgraceful hypocrisy imaginable.

The hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor) told us that she supported last year's tests for seven-year-olds, which were an enormous success. Almost in the same breath, she said that she supported the boycott of all tests by unions this year. How she can arrive at that position is quite beyond me. Opposition Members have come to the House on their day and have offered us no policies of their own.

Many Opposition Members have asked repeatedly that there should be a review of the testing regime. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has arranged for that to take place. He has asked the very distinguished new chairman of the School Curriculum and Assessment Authority, Sir Ron Dearing, to conduct just such a review. It is not good enough to say, as the hon. Member for Birmingham, Yardley (Ms Morris) said, that everyone knows what is wrong with the tests. That is a ludicrous statement. How can everybody know exactly what is wrong with all the tests? Some people may take the view that the tests need reviewing. We have conceded that. The Secretary of State has recognised that and he has asked Sir Ron Dearing to arrange for a review of the tests. My right hon. Friend asked him to look at the scope for slimming down the curriculum and to consider the future of the 10-level scale for grading children's attainments. How could the test arrangements be simplified? How could the central administration of the national curriculum and tests best be improved?

The key fact is this. In the letter written by Sir Ron Dearing to my right hon. Friend in which he accepts the challenge that he has been given, he says:

"if I do not have information from tests this Summer, I am going to have difficulty in giving well-informed and convincing advice on what changes should be made to the testing arrangements."

The very man who has been asked by the Secretary of State to conduct the review has said that if anything is done to prejudice the tests this summer he will not have the material with which to conduct the review for which Opposition Members have asked. How can they support the idea of a boycott which will undermine the tests and ask for a review that would be undermined by that same boycott? Opposition Members cannot have it both ways.

Mr. Malcolm Wicks (Croydon, North-West): If tests are a good idea for the state sector, why are not they a good enough idea for the private sector?

Mr. Forth: We have always recognised that if parents wish to exercise their freedom of choice by sending their children to the independent sector, they do so in the knowledge of what the independent sector offers. If they wish to take advantage of mandatory, taxpayer-funded education through the state system, we must provide them with a guarantee of the quality of education in that state system to which they are entitled.

Sir Peter Tapsell (East Lindsey): On the subject of tests in the private sector, may I tell my hon. Friend that when I was at a private school, we were tested at the end of every fortnight and beaten if we got less than 60 per cent.?

Mr. Forth: Today, my hon. Friend is a walking testimony to the system which educated him.

I come to the old favourite of Labour Members: Ministers do not listen. It was trotted out once again by the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster), among others. The reality is that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, the Minister of State and I go out of our way to talk to educators, professionals and teachers in their staff rooms, at conferences which we attend and at meetings in the Department for Education.

Mr. Enright: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Forth: I shall give way in a moment. I suppose I could claim that I had a dialogue with teachers which ran for something like 150 hours in the Standing Committee on the Education Bill, of which the hon. Gentleman was such a distinguished member.

Mr. Enright: Can the Minister tell the House whether Education Ministers have apologised to the school which they shamefully tricked into taking part in a party political broadcast?

Mr. Forth: I doubt whether anyone who was involved in such an exercise was naive enough not to know what was happening. The suggestion made by the hon. Gentleman does him no credit.

I hope that we have laid to rest any suggestion that Ministers in the Department for Education do not speak to those involved in education. That brings me to one of the more serious aspects of the debate which was referred to with great feeling by my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Mr. Thompson). He raised the matter of the professionalism of teachers. If teachers want the respect that the profession demands, we must ask them to act and behave like professionals. Acting as professionals in this context means working within the law, not breaking it. It means expressing concerns by dialogue and debate, not by industrial action. It means taking and accepting responsibility for the pupils in their charge, not casually dismissing the welfare of pupils to promote their own self-interests.

Mr. Walden: My hon. Friend is not a naive man. If he is, he hides it successfully. Despite his kind words about the teacher unions, he knows that the whole spirit of comprehensive education is against testing. The only real hope that parents have to ensure a rigorous education for their children is to vote with their hands and feet for grant-maintained status.

Mr. Forth: My hon. Friend knows that an increasing number of parents are doing exactly that. With the number of grant-maintained schools at 800 and rising fast, the evidence is there that parents know how they can guarantee quality education for their children. Our testing regime seeks to guarantee objectivity, a level of standards and a reporting to parents of what is going on in schools of the sort which I sometimes think Labour Members are either ashamed of or want to conceal. That has certainly been the thrust of much of what they have said today.

Mr. Hawkins: Does my hon. Friend agree that the problem with Labour Members, many of whom benefited from a grammar school and direct grant school system of which this country could formerly be proud, is that a Labour Government got rid of it in the pursuit of trendy socialist thinking in the 1960s and the 1970s? Labour Members told their constituents and the British people, "Pull the ladder up, Jack. I'm all right". A Labour Government replaced the system with the low standards that we have seen from the militant teachers who are trying to align the teaching unions with the striking miners and the striking rail unions. Those militant teachers, unlike the majority of responsible teachers, do not deserve the status of the profession.

Mr. Forth: That sounded like an extremely effective peroration to this debate. I welcome the comments of my hon. Friend. The contrast could not be clearer. This debate —which astonishingly was brought to the House by Labour Members, and flopping so dramatically as it has —has illustrated only too well the difference in approach taken by Labour Members and Conservative Members.

Conservative Members wish to ensure that standards of education rise for all of our pupils. We want to guarantee all pupils in the state education system, regardless of their circumstances, their background or their school, an education of which we can be proud.

As part of that, we believe that openness about what goes on in our schools is vital. The testing regime is important. It must be standard and objective. It must be reported to parents. We must be told what is going on in our schools and we must be proud of it. Opposition Members have no concept of that. I ask the House to reject the motion and support the amendment.

Question accordingly negatived.

Question, That the proposed words be there added, put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 30 (Questions on amendments) and agreed to.

MADAM SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House welcomes the commitment of Her Majesty's Government to the National Curriculum and its associated regular tests; notes that the new independent inspectorate, the Office for Standards in Education (OFSTED), recently reported that the National Curriculum and regular tests were already helping to drive up standards in schools; believes that the progress made in the implementation of the Government's education reforms is due to the hard work and dedication of professional teachers and welcomes the review established by the Secretary of State for Education into the National Curriculum and testing; believes that a boycott of this summer's tests would disrupt children's education, cause unnecessary concern to parents and damage the professional standing of teachers; and looks forward to a definitive statement from Her Majesty's Opposition as to whether or not it supports a boycott of this summer's tests.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 14 (Exempted business),

That, at this day's sitting, the Charities Bill [Lords], the Clean Air Bill [Lords] and the Radioactive Substances Bill [Lords] may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.

Question agreed to.

Orders of the Day

Charities Bill [Lords]

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

10.18 pm

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): I congratulate those who are responsible for consolidating legislation because it makes things so much easier for non-lawyers who must deal with charities.

It is unfortunate that we will have a Charities Act 1992 and a Charities Act 1993, whose titles are obviously indistinguishable. Given that the Bill deals largely with incorporated charities, while the remit of 1992 Act is more general, it is pity that no distinction will be made between the titles of the respective Acts.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Derek Spencer): If the hon. Gentleman looks at the statute book, he will find other examples of statutes with similar titles. I do not believe that that source is likely to mislead those who will have to refer to those Acts.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time.

Bill committed to a Committee of the whole House.—[Mr. Greg Knight.]

Bill immediately considered in Committee; reported, without amendment; read the Third time, and passed, without amendment.

Clean Air Bill [Lords]

Read a Second time.

Bill committed to a Committee of the whole House.—[Mr. Greg Knight.]

Bill immediately considered in Committee; reported, without amendment; read the Third time, and passed, without amendment.

Radioactive Substances Bill [Lords]

Read a Second time.

Bill committed to a Committee of the whole House.—[Mr. Greg Knight.]

Bill immediately considered in Committee; reported, without amendment; read the Third time, and passed, without amendment.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Considering that we have whipped through all stages of three Bills in about three minutes—[Interruption.]—and while I have no doubt that hon. Members do not object to that, I suggest that it might be an idea for you or the Committee of Procedure to look at the wording used by the Whip as he introduces the various stages of Bills. I say that because it is a bit of a fallacy to say that the Committee told him to do anything, just as it is a fallacy to say that the Committee went through the Bill. By all means have a fast procedure for dealing with these matters, but let us at least be honest about the way we do it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): I have no doubt that the procedure has been carried out for many years and that it is quite in order.

Financial Provisions (Northern Ireland)

10.24 pm

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. Michael Mates): I beg to move,

That the draft Financial Provisions (Northern Ireland) Order 1993, which was laid before this House on 11th February, be approved.

The present order is the latest in a series of such orders required at invervals of every two to three years. The latest such order was passed in 1991. The main purpose of these orders is to adjust, as necessary, certain statutory financial limits and to deal with other routine financial matters including the simplification and rationalisation of accounting procedures. I will describe briefly the purpose of the various articles in the order.

Articles 3 to 11 together provide enabling powers for the establishment and management of trading funds in Northern Ireland. To a large extent, those articles simply replicate the corresponding Great Britain legislation, which is the Government Trading Funds Act 1973 as amended by the Government Trading Act 1990. They extend the reforms introduced some years ago in civil service financial management, as well as the next steps initiative which created the first executive agencies.

Mr. Roy Beggs (Antrim, East): Can the Minister tell the House whether the provisions in the order cover the situation which arose as a result of the fraud perpetrated on many investors in Northern Ireland, in Great Britain and, indeed, in the Irish Republic by a company known as International Investments Limited (Gibraltar)? For the last 10 years efforts have been made to have the matter resolved, but as yet no satisfactory conclusion has been reached. Many of my constituents, now pensioners, had been depending on their investment in the company, which is now in liquidation, to provide income for their retirement. Their experience has been replicated throughout the United Kingdom and in the Irish Republic. Will the order in any way help those investors——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. It is a very long intervention.

Mr. Mates: I am fairly sure that the answer to the hon. Gentleman's question is no. However, if I get better information, I undertake to speak again on the matter when, with the leave of the House, I hope to reply to the debate.

Mr. David Trimble (Upper Bann) rose——

Mr. Mates: I have not said anything yet.

Mr. Trimble: May I take the Minister back to something that he said in his opening sentences? He said that the order is reproducing for Northern Ireland legislation enacted for Great Britain in 1973 and amended in 1990. As 1990 is the date for the Great Britain legislation, why has it taken three years to produce a Northern Ireland equivalent which runs merely to 10 pages of drafting?

Mr. Mates: The hon. Gentleman bangs a familiar drum. There are advantages and disadvantages in the system which we have inherited as a result of direct rule. Sometimes we consider what happens in Great Britain and learn good lessons from it. Sometimes we want to replicate precisely what has happened in the rest of the United Kingdom and sometimes we do not. I make no apology; the system which my colleageus and I have inherited brings the order before the House.

Mr. Trimble rose——

Mr. Mates: I will not give way. The hon. Gentleman——

Mr. Trimble: The Minister has not answered my intervention.

Mr. Mates: I have indeed. I have told the hon. Gentleman that the reason is the legislative system with which we live.

Article 3 provides the general power, already available in the rest of the United Kingdom, to establish a trading fund where its revenue would consist principally of receipts in respect of goods and services provided and where it would lead to improved management efficiency and effectiveness. Candidates for trading fund status would be considered on a case-by-case basis if and when they arose.

Article 4 deals with how the originating debt of a trading fund is to be determined and the circumstances in which this originating debt may be varied to take account of subsequent changes in the assets and liabilities of the fund.

Article 5 deals with the issue and repayment of public dividend capital and article 6 with borrowing by funds. In particular, article 6 allows funds to borrow from votes as an alternative to borrowing from the Northern Ireland consolidated fund. It is expected that the majority of borrowing by trading funds will be from votes.

Article 7 describes how the income and expenditure arising from the routine activities of a fund should be treated and provides for a trading fund to reimburse the consolidated fund in respect of accruing liabilities for employees' pensions, and so on.

Article 8 requires that a trading fund should be entirely self-financing and provides for the handling of temporary surpluses. It also describes the accounting and auditing arrangements to be put in place and contains an important provision relating to the production and publication of annual reports.

Article 9 deals with the winding-up of funds and the distribution of the assets and liabilities. I should make it clear that the article refers only to cases where a fund's activities are to cease altogether. Examples would be where two funds are merged, or where it is decided that the activities of a fund would be better financed by other means within the public sector. There is no intention to deal here with privatisation candidates. Such cases would, in every instance, be pursued by quite separate legislative measures.

Article 10 and 11 deal largely with minor consequential matters. Article 12 deals with a separate matter which may conveniently be associated with the previous articles. It extends section 22 of the Exchequer and Audit (Northern Ireland) Act 1921 to give the Department of Finance and Personnel powers to require any agency to produce commercial-style accounts, including balance sheets. The aim is to ensure that agencies that are not trading funds would supplement the appropriation accounts by producing commercial-type accounts on an accruals basis and, by so doing, increase the information available to the House and the general public. The measure will bring the position in Northern Ireland into line with that in the rest of the United Kingdom.

[Mr. Mates]

Article 13 would enable the Northern Ireland Comptroller and Auditor-General, in his corporate capacity, to purchase property leasehold. The only effect of that provision will be to place the Northern Ireland Comptroller and Auditor-General in the same position as his counterpart in Great Britain, who already has such a power. The intention is for the Northern Ireland Audit Office, in keeping with its independent status, to move from its present location in a Government building to its own office accommodation.

Article 14 amends article 3 of the Financial Provisions (Northern Ireland) Order 1986 by raising the statutory limit on the net amount which the consolidated fund may lend to the Housing Executive to finance its capital programme.

Article 15 provides that fees paid to the Registrar of Companies in respect of his function under the various companies orders should be paid into the consolidated fund. At present, the Department of Finance and Personnel must direct how those fees are to be handled. Recent legal advice suggests that the legislation, as presently drafted, could prevent the Registrar of Companies from recovering the full cost of his services for which he levies fees or charges. The amendment will remove that difficulty and simplify procedures generally.

I commend the order to the House.

Mr. Roger Stott (Wigan): I shall endeavour to ensure that we treat the order almost as quickly as we treated the previous measures, but it is important that we give hon. Members from Northern Ireland an opportunity to examine the Minister's remarks.

As the Minister of State has just said, the order is primarily technical and provides for routine financial and administrative matters within all—and I stress that word—Departments of the Northern Ireland Office. Remembering the late hour of yesterday's debates, I have no doubt that hon. Members will be relieved to learn that I do not intend to speak for long. However, I should like to take the opportunity to draw to the Minister's attention some of my concerns about the various Departments in Northern Ireland and the way in which the Minister and his colleagues are going about their business.

The Minister will be aware that, despite just having embarked upon a new financial year, Northern Ireland still faces some regrettably familiar problems. Unemployment continues to rise and, judging by the most recent provisional figures, Northern Ireland's gross domestic product continues to fall. Those harsh facts, when translated into equally stark figures, mean that the Province suffers a jobless total representing 14·5 per cent. of the work force and a decline in GDP in real terms of 2·5 per cent. during 1991.

Mr. Irvine Patnick (Lords Commissioner to the Treasury): That is not in order.

Mr. Stott: The Whip tells me that this is not in order, but I shall wait for the Chair to tell me that it is not in order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair will tell the hon. Gentleman that he is going very wide of the order.

Mr. Stott: I accept that my initial remarks allude to the problems that face the Department of Employment in Northern Ireland. That Department has a problem in the ongoing and continuing rise in unemployment.

However, article 3 provides for a trading fund to be established. The Government's explanatory document, which the Minister kindly sent me, says:

"where a trading fund operation would lead to improved efficiency".

I and my hon. Friends agree with the phraseology, and I am sure that the Minister will agree that we have actively demonstrated our commitment to improved efficiency throughout Labour local government in England and Wales. However, as we know from example, the Government's interpretation of efficiency is at variance with that of the Opposition. The Government should not see any trading fund as a halfway house to privatisation. I was interested to hear the Minister say this evening that that was not the case. However, I confess that I am not convinced. I still believe that this may well be a stalking horse for further privatisation in Northern Ireland.

Improved efficiency means maintaining value for money and high quality service. I hope that the Minister can assure the House that any operations that are transferred to a trading fund will not merely result in corner cutting or a slapdash decline in the quality of the service that the Departments provide.

I am sure that when the Minister replies he will gladly read into the record what is contained in the explanatory document, which says that the order has "no direct implications for public expenditure"— that presumably means that there will be no cut in public expenditure—

"and will not cause any change in staff numbers."

I hope that the Minister will confirm that that means exactly what it says.

The order will impinge on a number of Departments in Northern Ireland, one of which is the Department of the Environment. There is great concern in Northern Ireland and among hon. Members who represent Northern Ireland about water privatisation. The Government have already started the water privatisation procedure, and I hope that the order is not a behind-the-door way of facilitating privatisation.

Mr. Beggs: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman agrees that it would be appropriate for the Government to take account of the opposition of all Northern Ireland representatives elected to the House and to the European Parliament to any proposals to privatise Northern Ireland water and sewerage services.

Mr. Stott: Whenever the House debates narrow Northern Ireland orders, it is difficult to stay in order. That is because there is no primary legislation allowing myself or Northern Ireland Members an adequate opportunity to debate the principles behind such orders and to table amendments. Therefore, on occasions such as this, Mr. Deputy Speaker, we hope to enjoy your tolerance. I may be testing your tolerance to the extreme——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That may well be the case. Hon. Members must stick strictly to the order, which concerns the establishment of trading funds in Northern Ireland. I do not know what that has to do with water privatisation.

Mr. Stott: Trading funds have been established on the mainland since 1974. They cover a multitude of activities. The trading funds established by the order cover every Department in Northern Ireland. They include the Department of the Environment, which is in charge of water services, ports and airports; and the Department of Social Security, which is concerned with social security benefits. Therefore, there could be a small degree of elasticity in alluding to certain problems.

I am not seeking to delay the debate, and I am desperately trying to keep within the rules of order. However, it is important to flag up certain issues that I and my hon. Friends feel are important.

Mr. Mates: Perhaps I can help the hon. Gentleman and the House. It was a little noisy at the start of this debate, as we had been proceeding at a fairly hectic pace. I will repeat more slowly my opening remarks. It is not the intention to deal in the order with any privatisation candidates. Such cases will in every instance be pursued by separate legislative measures. If there are to be any privatisation candidates, there will be an opportunity for full discussion of separate legislation. The order will not be used for that purpose.

Mr. Stott: The Minister has put that firmly on the record and in the public domain, and it will remain so for ever and a day. However, one thinks of other statements, not necessarily in the House, such as that during the general election campaign, by no less a person than the Prime Minister, that there would be no increases in value added tax. As soon as the Prime Minister was elected, there was an increase——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I insist that the hon. Gentleman confines his remarks to the scope of the order, of which he is fully aware.

Mr. Stott: I acknowledge your ruling, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and will endeavour to cease to cause you any further problems.

Mr. Beggs: The Minister did not spell out whether future legislation would come in the form of Bills or unamendable Orders in Council. I think that the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott) will agree that that should have been dealt with, and that representatives of the Northern Ireland community should have been told clearly whether we could effectively amend proposed legislation affecting Northern Ireland.

Mr. Stott: I hear what the hon. Gentleman says. I cannot recall his constituency——

Mr. Beggs: Antrim, East.

Mr. Stott: Antrim, East: the hon. Gentleman represents the wonderful port of Larne. I hear what he says, but I am not speaking from the Government Dispatch Box.

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): Your day will come.

Mr. Stott: Yes; my reward may well be in heaven. However, I will leave the Minister to deal with the problem identified by the hon. Member for Antrim, East (Mr. Beggs), as he has offered us the opportunity of listening to his cast-iron guarantee that nothing in the order is a stalking horse for future privatisation measures.

Provided that the Minister's response convinces me that there is no hidden agenda behind the establishment of trading funds, the Opposition will not oppose the motion.

Mr. William Ross (Londonderry, East): I apologise for arriving a little late; because the business moved rather more quickly than I had expected, I missed the Minister's opening remarks. However, I have heard enough to realise that the Minister was entirely in order—although, as my hon. Friend the Member for Antrim, East (Mr. Beggs) pointed out, we are very gratified that he touched the boundaries when he said that there would be proper discussion and proper legislative procedures in the future. We are also happy to have the support of Her Majesty's Opposition for Bills rather than Orders in Council.

The order raises a number of questions. I have listened to a number of debates on such orders over the years; some have been purely technical, while others have ranged rather more widely. One thing that puzzles me is the fact that the last debate on an order of this kind, which took place on 14 March 1991, was in the Sixth Standing Committee; the one before that, which took place on 22 May 1989, was held on the Floor of the House, as others have been. I should be grateful if the Minister would tell me what criterion dictates whether orders are taken here, late at night, or early in the morning. After all, they are all in the same class.

Is this a matter of convenience, or does it reflect the importance that the Government attach to such orders? The Minister points at the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott): perhaps he is responsible for the motion's being given the time of the House. We do not object to that, but consistency is always welcome.

Mr. Stott: Hon. Members will recall that, when we last debated the consolidation order, I pointed out that it was important for us to do so on the Floor of the House. The hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble) asked whether we would consider doing that more frequently; I acquiesced.

Mr. Ross: I am very grateful to Her Majesty's Opposition: this is a happy move. I believe that more Northern Ireland business should be taken on the Floor of the House; if that moves us on to proper legislation, so much the better. Every tottering millimetre in that direction is welcome to us.

The hon. Member for Wigan and the Minister will no doubt recall that the last order paved the way for water privatisation and showed that the Government hoped to have a Government-owned company to take over water and sewerage as from 1 October 1992. I shall return to that point at the end of my speech, but it is significant to note that that was a paving operation for water privatisation. Time has moved on, and we find that this order enables the establishment of trading funds in Northern Ireland.

I understand that the Minister drew the attention of the House to the remarkable fact that the order brings the law of Northern Ireland into line with the law of Great Britain. It is of some interest that in this respect the law of Great Britain, in its present form, had its beginnings in 1973, 20 years ago, after the passage of the Government Trading

[Mr. Ross]

Funds Act. That Act was amended by the Government Trading Act 1990. It is evident, therefore, that there was some rethinking of the Government's policies, as embodied in the 1973 Act. I suspect that the developments in practice which flowed from the 1973 Act led to that rethinking.

The order is a fairly surprising outcome for a Government who always told us that they were against quangos. Now we find that, as a result of those Acts, a number of new quangos and agencies have been created. In the 1970s and early 1980s we were told that the Government were against quangos and that they were all for folk taking on personal responsibility. There are few signs of Government Ministers accepting personal responsibility for what happened in the intervening years. A large number of agencies—108—have been created.

I believe that in what is now the United Kingdom legislation there is the possibility of four different agencies being created—those created with gross running costs control, those created with net running costs control, trading funds and Government-owned companies. I believe that the latter has not yet been used; the Minister will no doubt correct me if I am wrong. However, as the hon. Member for Wigan and the Minister will probably recall, it was this fourth type of agency that was predicted for the first step of water privatisation in Northern Ireland.

I wonder whether it was possible to create a Government-owned company in Northern ireland without this legislation. If it was not, why is it now being brought into operation? Like the hon. Member for Wigan, I always take ministerial statements with a fistful of salt.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned VAT increases. The Government did not increase VAT. They simply extended its scope and base. They kept within the letter of the promises made. That, I suppose, is what Ministers pay high-quality civil servants for—to find ways round the promises that they make.

Of the 108 agencies that so far have been created, not so much in Great Britain as in the United Kingdom, there are seven which are Northern Ireland civil service agencies. They can be easily named. There may be a few that are not on my list, but they include the Compensation Agency, which is a Northern Ireland agency, the Driver and Vehicle Testing Agency, where there must be a Northern Ireland input, the Northern Ireland Child Support Agency, the Ordnance Survey of Northern Ireland—which, I note, is a separate body from the Ordnance Survey for the rest of the United Kingdom—the Rate Collection Agency, which, the Opposition will notice, we still need, unlike the position in Great Britain, the Training and Employment Agency and the Valuation and Lands Agency. Those are all civil service organisations, not trading organisations in the real sense foreshadowed in the order.

There are also 12 trading funds, some of which must operate in Northern Ireland. For instance, there is the Medicines Control Agency, which I suppose must have a Northern Ireland input. There is the Land Registry, too. I am not sure whether that is the land registry for Northern Ireland or for the United Kingdom, and I should be grateful to be told. We also have Her Majesty's Stationery Office and various others—the Central Office of Information and so forth. I should be grateful if when the Minister winds up he would tell me which of those operate on a United Kingdom rather than a Great Britain basis.

I have two basic objections to all those organisations. The first is that, whether or not the Government are willing to acknowledge the fact, by creating them they have admitted their own lack of ability to control the Government machine and to keep it efficient and clean. The second is that they put the Minister at arm's length in terms of accountability. I believe that "hiving off" is the term used in Government documents and statements.

When someone hives something off, it means that he is trying to get some distance away from it, so that he can say, "It is not really me at all; it is the agency." I know that the Minister would respond to that idea by saying that at the end of the day Members of the House can demand an answer from a Minister. But there is not the direct accountability that we used to have. I regret that, because I believe that there should be direct accountability. If the Government cannot run a lean and efficient machine they certainly have no business telling other people that they should do so. Not only do the agencies mean arm's-length accountability, they are a demonstration that the Government do not really believe in their own capacity to do the job.

In the light of all that, can the Minister assure me that the order leaves Northern Ireland law exactly the same as Great Britain law? Or are there some differences left, and if so, what are they? We deserve an answer to those questions.

The Minister touched upon some of the matters that I wish to mention. I notice that under article 7 receipts and payments are not to be treated as part of public income and expenditure in Northern Ireland for the purposes of the Exchequer and Financial Provisions Act (Northern Ireland) 1950. Can we be told what the practical consequences of that change are? I am thinking of changes that may come about in the estimates and in the manner in which they are compiled and presented to the House. What difference will it all make to the appropriation orders and the debates on them? If it will make a difference, we need to know the details, so that we shall be prepared for the changes.

Article 14 increases the limit on outstanding issues from the Consolidated Fund to the Northern Ireland Housing Executive. That is to be done because we are approaching the limit. Can we be told what the outstanding issue from the Consolidated Fund is now and when it is expected to be breached? The Minister will know that the Housing Executive is screaming its head off because it reckons that it will not get enough money over the next year or two, so perhaps in two, three or four years—perhaps in only one year; no one really knows—we shall be confronted with another order to raise the limits. We need to know how long the Housing Executive is expected to exist—it might say "subsist"—on the sums against which it can now draw. Can the Minister give an undertaking that if its assertions that it is being treated harshly and is running out of cash are subsequently proved correct, more money will be made available by an immediate increase in the limits?

The rest of the order is fairly clear. I have no objection to the necessary changes. However, if we consider those changes over time we shall see a considerable shift in how the Northern Ireland government machine has worked and how it is intended to work in future. So I should be grateful for answers to the questions that I have tried to frame to the Minister.

10.59 pm

Mr. David Trimble (Upper Bann): I rise only because of the Minister's failure to respond adequately to my intervention in his speech. He will recall that I asked him why we have had to wait, at a conservative estimate, three years for legislation equivalent to Great Britain legislation in 1973 and in 1990. Taking 1990 as the datum point, we have had to wait three years to have an Order in Council drafted.

The Minister gave purely generalised arguments. He said that it is sometimes an advantage to wait until the Great Britain legislation is in operation so that one can fine-tune the Northern Ireland legislation. He did not address the issue specifically with regard to the order. I ask him to tell us whether this order had been fine-tuned compared with the Great Britain legislation. I noted that when my hon. Friend the Member for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross) asked whether there were now any differences between the law in Northern Ireland and the law in Great Britain, the Minister shook his head. I hope that he will address that matter specifically.

Mr. Mates: I am ever the optimist. If that is the only reason why the hon. Gentleman rose, I shall help him. There was no need to follow Great Britain legislation, which was very restrictive and finely drawn, until we came to the next steps agency process. We are now enabling the next steps process, which has been going in the United Kingdom, to be introduced, because we have some candidates for it. So we need the same legislation.

Mr. Trimble rose——

Mr. Mates: I did not think that that was the only reason why the hon. Gentleman decided to speak.

Mr. Trimble: Do I take the Minister to mean that there has not been a three-year delay in producing the order and that the Government considered producing the order only when they decided to follow the next steps agency programme? That raises two questions. Why is the order so many years behind the Great Britain programme on the matter? Does that reflect any question of policy? Was there a decision not to follow Great Britain in terms of the next steps agencies? Was that policy then changed? Or is it merely a reflection of the general sloth that afflicts the Northern Ireland Office?

There are now, I presume from what the Minister has said, candidates in Northern Ireland for the next steps agency process. In that case, I hope that the Minister will tell us precisely who those candidates are and what the Government's plans are. If the Government did not consider it necessary to have legislation until they had candidates for next steps agencies and were preparing bodies for next steps agencies, clearly those plans must exist now. It is only right that the Minister should tell us what they are.

From my intervention and from my brief contribution in the debate, you will understand, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that we are most dissatisfied with the way in which the Order in Council procedure is used. It is not a satisfactory procedure. The Minister has given an explanation for the delay tonight. However, we could point to numerous other items of legislation in which there are significant delays. No adequate explanation is forthcoming. Delays are built into the system and it is utterly inadequate for proceedings here, as we have demonstrated this evening. I am glad that the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott) commented on that.

There are other faults in the system, such as its secretiveness. The Government have secret consultation procedures with certain interested bodies and keep others in the dark. We had an example of that only this week. Important legislative proposals were leaked in The Independent on Monday. It turns out that they have been a matter of consultation with other bodies for weeks. Yet no political party in Northern Ireland was consulted.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman heard me pull up the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott) because of the scope of the order. The hon. Gentleman is straying very wide. I must insist that the hon. Gentleman sticks to the order.

Mr. Trimble: I am sorry, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that you considered that I was straying wide. I was merely referring to the legislative process, of which this is an example. The Order in Council procedure is an inadequate legislative process. Has the Minister read the report of the Hansard Society on legislation and its comments on this sort of Order in Council? Does the Northern Ireland Office intend to take those comments seriously?

11.4 pm

Dr. Joe Hendron (Belfast, West): Normally, when one speaks on matters to do with financial provisions, one tends to do a bit of whining. I shall start by making a few positive remarks. Mr. Deputy Speaker, I am conscious of what you said to the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott) about going a little wide of the mark, so I shall be as relevant to this debate as I can.

Remarks have been made recently by the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, the Foreign Secretary and the right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux) as the leader of the Official Unionist party. Until one understands, one might wonder about the relevance of that to this debate. I see a direct relevance between financial provisions and political progress. The people in Northern Ireland are crying out for peace and I hope that a political dialogue will start soon.

With regard to funding in Northern Ireland, I have studied this document. I must admit that it has nothing to do with appropriations. Perhaps the Minister could explain those matters which relate, for example, to the Department of Health and Social Services, the crucifixion of the royal group of hospitals in Belfast and the massive——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. Gentleman, but he must stick to the scope of the motion.

Dr. Hendron: I hope that this is relevant to the debate. I am referring directly to the document. I am aware of trading funds and other financial matters. I draw the attention of the Minister to one of the most deprived areas of Northern Ireland, indeed, in these islands—west Belfast. I am talking about the Falls and the Shankill. Catholic, Protestant, unionist or nationalist—one can call it what one likes. Could he explain how, in the order, the Departments are using funds to help young people who are being exploited daily by the Provisional IRA and the Ulster Defence Association? I may be straying wide of the mark, but I have almost finished. I ask the Minister to refer to those specific issues because they are important to my area. I accept that this is not the most suitable debate in which to raise such matters.

[Dr. Hendron]

Mr. Mates: With the leave of the House, I shall respond briefly to hon. Members' comments.

I deal first with the comments of the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott). I could not have been clearer in what I said. I think he heard it the first time, and he heard it quieter and more slowly the second time. The fact that he still claims not to understand it is a little of what I might call poetic licence, so I will not pursue the matter.

I have answered the question of the hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble) about the reason why we are doing this. [Interruption.] Perhaps he will listen; I listened to him. We already have seven next steps agencies. The hon. Gentleman was sharp to notice that I launched the valuation of lands agency at 2 o'clock today in Belfast. There are seven agencies, and three further candidates are under consideration. That amounts to some 9,000 civil servants—more than 30 per cent. of the staff of the Northern Ireland Departments in the Northern Ireland Office. That is not slothful. Nor is it a record of which we can be other than proud. But so far none of them has needed trading fund status or been candidates for it. Therefore, we are taking the steps that I have described. Far from being slothful, we are taking those steps in good time so that if we have any candidates for trading fund status, we have the legislation in place. I hope that that makes the position perfectly clear.

The hon. Member for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross) was a little unfair when he talked about quangos. Several quangos were set up in two short intermissions of socialism in an otherwise long period of Conservative rule. But next steps agencies are not quasi-governmental organisations. They are distinct business areas within Government Departments. The chief executives are directly responsible to the relevant Ministers. As luck would have it, I am the Minister to whom the chief executive of all the agencies which he mentioned is responsible. Therefore, I am not answering at arm's length but answering directly to hon. Members from Northern Ireland constituencies for the actions of those agencies. The accounting officer is fully answerable too.

The hon. Member for Londonderry, East asked whether there was a relationship between next steps agencies and Government-owned companies. Government-owned companies are a distinct category and the legislation is not relevant to their establishment.

The last item that was mentioned by the hon. Members for Wigan and for Londonderry, East was water privatisation. As they put it, they were sailing on the perimeters of order in doing so. Perhaps I can sail down that limit and give them an answer. The House will want to know that a consultancy study into the options for the privatisation of water and sewerage services in Northern Ireland has been completed. It has confirmed the feasibility of privatisation. However, for technical reasons, privatisation will not be possible in the lifetime of this Parliament.

The Government remain committed to privatisation at the earliest practicable date. They believe that privatisation will offer benefits to the economy of Northern Ireland and, through appropriate regulation, directly to consumers, the environment and the general public. We are considering the best form of privatisation, including the benefits of a public offer for sale. In the meantime, we intend to explore the scope to introduce private finance into the provision of water and sewerage services in Northern Ireland to facilitate further improvements in drinking water quality and environmental standards in line with EC requirements. But, for the avoidance of doubt, let me say that it will not be possible, for technical reasons, to privatise the water industry in the lifetime of this Parliament.

Mr. Trimble rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is the Minister giving way or finishing?

Mr. Mates: I give way.

Mr. Trimble: I thank the Minister for the more precise explanation about the legislation. He said that the legislation was intended to prepare the way for next steps agencies that will require trading fund status. Presumably, the legislation will not be necessary if no next steps agencies will require trading fund status. It is a fair assumption to draw from the legislation that if the Government are making provision for next steps agencies to have trading fund status, there are proposals to give agencies such status. I should be grateful if the Minister would tell us which they are.

Mr. Mates: I can go no further than I went. I have been as open and frank with the House as I possibly can. We are introducing the order to bring the position of Northern Ireland in line with the rest of the United Kingdom. We are doing it in good time so that when and if we require the legislation to proceed with the next steps process, we have it in place in good time and properly. On that basis, I commend——

Mr. Beggs: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Mates: I am being very generous.

Mr. Beggs: I thank the Minister for giving way, and especially for the latter part of his response to this debate. I would not wish to claim that representations from Her Majesty's Opposition or from the elected representatives in Northern Ireland influenced the decision not to proceed at this time with the privatisation of water and sewerage services. Nevertheless, I welcome the announcement and trust that there will be no urgency on the part of the Government to proceed with that issue for some time.

Mr. Mates: It is amazing the number of times I have had to say things twice tonight. The Government are fully committed to the privatisation process. For a number of technical reasons, we have come to the conclusion that it is not possible to do it during the lifetime of this Parliament.

With those final words, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I commend the order to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft Financial Provisions (Northern Ireland) Order 1993, which was laid before this House on 11th February, be approved.

Housing (Basildon)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Nicholas Baker.]

11.16 pm

Mr. David Amess (Basildon): I am particularly pleased to see my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) here this evening. She is an inspiration to the House, and to me in particular. I know that she is highly delighted about the success of her constituent Eamonn Martin in the London marathon on Sunday. He is her constituent, living in Laindon, but he runs for Basildon athletics club.

Much as I and the House appreciate the very considerable attractions of my constituency, I have to make it absolutely clear that it is simply not possible, or indeed desirable, for the whole of the United Kingdom to be housed in my constituency of Basildon.

As any hon. Member will freely admit, the No. 1 demand from constituents as they come to one's surgery is always for accommodation. But throughout the 10 years that I have represented the town, some of the demands have become increasingly unreasonable. Much of this, I believe, is caused by what I describe as the breakdown of traditional family life in this country and the popularity of transient relationships. By this I mean men moving in and out of relationships with women, producing children and then abandoning those women and the children. This trend I utterly condemn. The women and the children are the victims of the irresponsible behaviour of many men. It is not acceptable for those men to regard the state as a substitute family; it can never be that.

This practice is certainly causing mayhem to housing demands throughout the country, not just in Basildon, together with the inability of many family units to support 16, 17 and 18-year-olds. All this I see as impacting on housing needs, not just in my constituency but throughout the land. It is just not possible for the state to meet all the demands that are being made on it at the moment.

Until May of last year, the socialists ran the council in Basildon, when they were thrown out of office. Their housing policy, such as it was, was an absolute disgrace, and led to continual charges of unfairness. There was complete hostility to the private sector, and the socialists saw housing simply as a means to foster their own insidious propaganda. Nowhere can this be more clearly seen than in connection with what happened over the transfer of housing and the ballot that then took place.

A number of officers put aside the respected tradition of political neutrality and were recruited to help their brothers and sisters in their political cause. Those people, I recall, said that they would never work with a Conservative council, if it were ever elected, or indeed serve under a Conservative Government. I trust that the officers who made those statements are examining their consciences at the moment and are no longer in the council's employ.

Quite what the housing policy was is not clear. Whether they saw senior citizens or young people as a captive market I do not know, but, whatever the demands, somehow they would pretend that the state could meet them.

So we had the ridiculous situation whereby no one on the engaged couples list ever got housed. I grew increasingly tired of parents coming to my surgery and complaining that their children were never offered accommodation. They said that they had come to the town as pioneers in 1952 and that they had been promised accommodation for second and third generations, but it had never happened.

People complained that they had been given off-the-record advice in the area offices that the way to get housed was to have a baby. What disgraceful advice that was, and what an environment in which to bring a child into the world. Charges were continually made of unfairness in the allocation of property. Time after time, constituents would imply corruption, which was difficult to substantiate. They would say that so-and-so knew someone in the housing department and managed to get housed. They asked me how that could have happened. I never had an answer, as the charges were never based on firm evidence.

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): Is it not a fact that, despite all the appalling Labour party policies, the Conservative party policy to allow people to buy their own home took off wonderfully well in a new town which had formerly only rented property, so that today more than 57 per cent. of all households in Basildon are owner-occupied? It is a much higher percentage than in Battersea, for example, which is reckoned to be a yuppie place, calls itself "Battarsia" and has a postal address of south west one one.

Mr. Amess: I was not aware of the history of Battersea, but my hon. Friend is an inspiration to us all. She is quite right about the success of the sale of council houses. As we all know, the Labour party fought that policy word by word and line by line. Labour Members never wanted to enfranchise people by giving them the opportunity to own their own houses and enjoy the discounts. My hon. Friend was right to remind the House of that.

It has been a nightmare for the newly elected Conservative council to unravel the mess. However, it is well on the way to arriving at a fair policy whereby we shall have to draw a line under what has gone before, and everyone will be clear about the criteria for getting public accommodation.

I am advised that, later this month, the authority is to engage a new housing director with considerable expertise and that the new council enthusiastically embraces the Government's policies on the right to buy, share ownership and financial assistance for tenants to move back into the private sector.

I am delighted to tell the House that council arrears have now been tackled; the reduction in the past six months is double the total of all reductions in arrears in the past 10 years. That is quite incredible. Default action initiatives have been successfully piloted in Basildon and Billericay. I pay a warm tribute to the leader of the council, Tony Archer, the chairman of the housing committee, Councillor Brin Jones, and his deputy Councillor Mark Francois, for their splendid efforts. The housing committee has accepted the citizens charter, with performance indicators produced by the Audit Commission.

There was scarcely a clearer example of socialist hypocrisy in housing matters than in the ballot for the transfer of commission houses to either the local authority or a housing association. On a number of occasions, the socialist council had been offered the Commission for the

[Mr. Amess]

New Towns property and, when close to settlement, pulled out of the deal with the Departent of the Environment, producing considerable loss of income to local residents. That was in stark contrast to socialist-controlled Harlow, which accepted the property from the Commission for the New Towns.

In a wicked fashion, socialist activists embarked on a campaign to pretend that the Government would deprive tenants of their democratic right to choose the landlord of their liking. I recall their many bizarre distortions of the Government's policy. They deliberately tried to scare tenants, particularly the elderly, against the attraction of any other landlord. It is somewhat ironic that it took a Conservative council to conduct the ballot and enable local residents to choose their landlord.

I am delighted to tell the House that four out of five tenants felt sufficiently confident with the Conservative council to support a change of landlord—85 per cent. of them chose that council as their preferred landlord. The rest chose the admirable Basildon housing association. Sadly, some 2,000 tenants chose not to exercise their vote, and their properties are now in the course of being allocated. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Harlow (Mr. Hayes) went through a similar process of housing transfer recently.

I would be grateful if my hon. Friend the Minister could tell me about the time scale of the transfer, how that matter will be handled and how those tenants who did not express a preference will be allocated their landlord.

The Government have already decided to provide finance for the Siporex redevelopment and rebuild, and the Basildon housing association will be responsible for the project. It is interesting to note, however, that their parallel consultation exercise resulted in more than two thirds of tenants choosing the Basildon housing association rather than the council as their landlord.

In the time that I have been involved in the whole sorry saga, a number of the unhelpfully designed and environmentally hostile estates in my constituency have come to need structural changes. I know that the residents of those estates are delighted that the Government, through the CNT, will ensure that the Siporex properties are brought up to the highest possible standard. The local authority was pleased with its housing investment programme allocation and the fact that £319,000 has been applied to another housing association scheme. It is also pleased that all requested capital programme improvements by council JEM—joint estate management—schemes have been agreed out of expected funds of £2·4 million.

The local authority and its tenants were also delighted that, thanks to Government support, the redevelopment of the Crudens estate has now started. I was privileged to be present at the recent start of work. I know that one of the Housing Ministers hopes to visit that scheme later this year. Because of the expensive works involved, that scheme must be carried out over a number of phases. Tenants have asked me to try to get some information from my hon. Friend about when the further stages, which include the remaining parts of the estate, will start. The council would, as ever, be grateful for any financial support when the appropriate allocations are made.

The council is also anxious for the Government to continue their support so that the extensive underpinning of works on properties opposite St. Mary's church hall, the Triangle, Langdon Hills can be finished. I hope that the contractors will bear local residents in mind, because they do not want their lives to be made hell by the constant flow of heavy lorries in and out of the estate.

The housing committee believes that it has kept its homelessness figures relatively low by utilising all manner of innovative housing. That includes leasing short-term properties and leasing police and Essex county council properties, unused sheltered housing schemes and so on.

The whole issue of bed and breakfast accommodation is a real worry for the council. My hon. Friends will agree that the amount of money being expended on that sort of accommodation is crazy, for it is not satisfactory, and most constituents must go to Southend which, although a lovely seaside resort, is not exactly close to our area. There must be a better and more cost-effective method of dealing with the problem.

The council is reviewing its points allocation system. Some members feel strongly that the Government should agree to all waiting list applicants, and not all so-called homeless families, taking social housing that is available. They believe that that policy would mean that those on the waiting list would get into the homeless situation. They think it unfair that couples should wait three, four or five years when the homeless are housed in 18 to 24 months. The whole concept and application of homelessness requires careful definition.

Mrs. Gorman: Is it not a fact that the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977, a typical piece of socialist legislation, has been responsible for stimulating some very anti-social behaviour on the part of some parents, who deliberately throw their youngsters out of the house to put pressure on the council to house them, with the taxpayer footing the bill?

Mr. Amess: I agree with my hon. Friend. Such anti-social behaviour, with children being thrown on to the streets, causes general disturbance and is totally unacceptable. Parents must accept greater responsibility.

An Englishman's home, like a Basildonian's, is his castle. I thank and congratulate the housing ministerial team at the Department of the Environment for the support and encouragement we have been given over the years. I sometimes get angry, as does my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay, with the lack of individual responsibility on the part of some people and the abuse of publicly provided housing. It is not necessary to have a lot of money to be clean and tidy and behave well. The anti-social behaviour of some people in settled areas, upsetting everyone, is not acceptable.

Frankly, I and the council could never provide sufficient housing to meet the endless demand. A fair and reasonable policy is needed. I am absolutely committed to ensuring the provision of housing of the very highest standards for all local residents in my constituency. Clear evidence of the warm-heartedness of my constituents was revealed in the latest census of the possession of household amenities, which showed that Basildon enjoyed per household the greatest number of central heating units in Britain.

11.32 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Tony Baldry): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) on securing this debate. The House knows that Basildon is close to the Government's heart, and I take this opportunity to congratulate Eamonn Martin, who typifies the spirit of Basildon, on winning this year's London marathon.

My hon. Friend is right to point out that much of the pressure on housing results from changes in the way we live. Too often, we speak of housing "need" when it is really expectation. Naturally, youngsters like independence, but I urge them and their families not to be too hasty in parting company if they cannot afford to house themselves.

There is no way in which the state can or could suggest, or has ever suggested, that it should house all young people when they become 18 and decide that they want to live on their own. There are already many spare rooms in private and local authority housing as families grow up and move on, and I hope that our tax incentives to people to let those rooms will help.

I share my hon. Friend's concerns about bed and breakfast. It is a wholly unsatisfactory system. It is unsatisfactory for those who are put in it and expensive on the public purse. I believe that there are currently over 70 households placed in bed and breakfast by Basildon district council—a legacy of Labour control—but I know that council members are looking at ways of bringing those numbers right down. Already they have shown enterprise in successfully bidding under our housing partnership scheme for resources that, along with housing corporation funds and private finance, will enable a housing association to build more than 50 homes to rent, and so reduce the need for bed and breakfast accommodation. Basildon council also bid successfully for a share of the extra resources announced in the autumn statement for a cash incentive scheme aimed at reducing homelessness.

We have recommended to council tenants that they think seriously about the right to buy. Now is the time to consider house purchase—with low prices, low interest rates and substantial discounts available. At the same time, to ensure that councils see the benefit in promoting sales, we are giving them an opportunity to put more of their capital receipts to work and to help homeless families. No doubt Conservative-controlled Basildon council will seize all those opportunities to benefit tenants who become home owners. The council will have the benefit of all the capital receipts which it can reinvest in housing in the district.

I am sure that Basildon's Conservative council will also want to develop its enabling role in order to offer the people of Basildon a better choice of housing than just the near-monopoly of municipal renting that they have had in the past. The previous Labour administration's slowness to team up with the housing association movement cost the people of Basildon dearly. Both we and the Housing Corporation were forced to conclude that money would be better allocated to areas where we considered that more cost-effective use would be made of it.

Basildon was under a Labour council with an unrealistic approach, which meant that it not only lost money from the Housing Corporation, so that housing associations could not build new homes to rent, but that it also lost the capacity to draw in further resources for housing from the private sector. I am glad to say that that is now in the past. The people of Basildon have voted, and Basildon now has a sensible Conservative council, determined to go forward and ensure that every family has a decent home in which to live.

As to the ballot among former new town tenants, I can understand that many voted for the familiarity of the council, encouraged by confidence in the newly elected Conservative council. The Basildon community housing association now has a useful stock as a basis for bigger and better things. I congratulate the association on its efforts. I am sure that those who voted for it will be pleased that they did so.

When the ballot was over, there was the question of empty houses and those of non-voters. Those have been allocated between the council and the housing association in the same proportion as the voting went, but in ways that make for good management. I understand that both the housing association and the council are content with that policy, which seems all very fair and sensible to me.

My hon. Friend referred to Siporex properties, which are coming to the end of their useful life and which it is proposed should be redeveloped. We have been very fair about them. Tenants of Siporex houses were given the chance to vote in the ballot in the same way as everyone else, even though it was not proposed that they should transfer for the time being. Most of them voted for the housing association, and as far as possible individual wishes will be met when redevelopment proposals have been worked out.

As my hon. Friend knows, the Crudens estate has benefited from estate action resources to the tune of £2,900,000 over three years. I do not blame my hon. Friend for hoping for more—indeed, as a result of his continued lobbying, we found another £200,000 for Crudens, and the district has also been able to pull in another £1,500,000 from the Housing Corporation. Basildon council has not asked us for any more money for that estate.

There is stiff competition for estate action resources, and I am sure that my hon. Friend appreciates that, if any further works are required on the Crudens estate, any bid would be considered alongside the requirements of estates elsewhere. We must recognise that some of those estates have problems that are even more serious than those of the Crudens estate.

I hope that I have shown my hon. Friend that we are well aware of the key local housing issues in Basildon. My Department's regional office is in regular contact with Basildon council, and my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing, Planning and Construction met leading members at the opening of a new housing association development there only three weeks ago. I know that Basildon council's current Conservative administration has inherited considerable difficulties, but I am confident that it will be both flexible and pragmatic in ensuring that its housing policies attract a fair and proper share of public resources for housing in Basildon and tap the maximum potential of private resources.

We are determined to have the best possible housing in Basildon, and I have confidence that, with a Conservative council, Basildon's housing strategy will continue to go from strength to strength.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at nineteen minutes to Twelve o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Political Contributions

1. Mr. Winnick: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will bring forward legislation to compel companies to ballot shareholders and employees before contributions are paid to a political party.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Corporate Affairs (Mr. Neil Hamilton): No. The present law requires sufficient disclosure. Shareholders can raise questions about political contributions at the annual general meeting if they are dissatisfied.

Mr. Winnick: Why no change? The Government demand that the trade unions ballot their members every 10 years as to whether political funds should be retained. Why not have the same for companies? Is it because it is the companies that denote money to the Tory party? Is there no limit to the sheer hypocrisy of the Government in relation to political funds? They should be thoroughly ashamed of themselves.

Mr. Hamilton: Our system of company law is very wide ranging and imposes extensive obligations on companies. If trade unions had to comply with such extensive obligations, they would not thank the hon. Gentleman for what he has said. It is very easy for a shareholder who is dissatisfied to sell his shares if he does not like his company's policy, but it is not quite as easy to change trade unions.

Mr. Matthew Banks: Does my hon. Friend agree that those who make decisions on behalf of companies to make donations are rightly subject to the accountability of shareholders? Does he further agree that those who make decisions do so in the best interests of their shareholders, their company and the prosperity of the nation as a whole?

Mr. Hamilton: I agree with my hon. Friend. If there had not been such abuses in the trade union movement, which were always supported by the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends over so many years, it would not have been necessary to bring in the obligations in 1984.

Mr. Fatchett: Is the Minister aware of the Sunday Times survey which showed that chairmen of companies that donated to the Conservative party had a 50 per cent. better chance of receiving a knighthood? Is not that a further indication of the corruption and sleaze which surround the Government? Is not it time that shareholders had real rights and were consulted before companies donate to the Tory party, which has done so much damage to the prospects of Britain's manufacturing industry?

Mr. Hamilton: I can remember a time not so long ago when it was a hanging offence in the Labour party to read the Murdoch press. I am glad to see that the Labour party has changed in some respects.

Mr. Roger Evans: Will my hon. Friend reject in terms the very sinister word in this question which so far appears to have been overlooked? The hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) asked not only for shareholders, the owners of the companies to be balloted but also employees? Will my hon. Friend reject this sinister attempt to extend trade union power?

Mr. Hamilton: I certainly do reject it. It is as a result of changes that we have made to trade union law over the last 13 years that trade unions no longer pose a danger to the economic prosperity of the country.

Post Office

2. Mr. Cummings: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what has been the contribution of Post Office services to Government revenues since 1979.

The President of the Board of Trade and Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Michael Heseltine): The cumulative total of the Post Office's external financing limit contributions from 1979-80 to 1991-92 is £802 million.

Mr. Cummings: Now that the Secretary of State has admitted that the Post Office made £800 million, will he agree that we have the best Post Office in Europe, with the most efficient work force? The Post Office, which has increased profits by over 50 per cent., is a huge public sector success and should remain so. When will he present to the House his most extensive and far-reaching review?

Mr. Heseltine: I am sorry that the hon. Member is still indulging in the language of the past. The moment that a company indicates a success by making a profit, somehow it is seen to be milking the customer. It is important that companies should earn sufficient surplus to pay for their investment programmes and to earn a reasonable return on capital, which is what the Post Office is doing.

Mr. David Nicholson: My right hon. Friend will have recalled, when he gave the information in his original reply, the value of the dictum that when an institution is in good working order it is a good idea not to mess about with it. Will he therefore give all the support that he can to the management of the Post Office so that it can continue to give an excellent service to consumers, whether in rural or urban areas? In particular, where a post office changes from Crown status to agency status, as is proposed for Wellington in my constituency, will he ensure that that post office continues to retain a central position and to provide high standards of service?

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend is right to seek an assurance that we are committed to enabling the Post Office to provide a high standard of service. That is why we have made it absolutely clear that the universality of service and of charge is not negotiable in any of the options that we are considering. However, I cannot ignore the fact that company after company that has moved from the public to the private sector has been able to achieve significant improvements in productivity, has played a role in the international market and has earned greater returns for this country than ever it was able to do in the public sector.

Mr. Robin Cook: May I invite the President of the Board of Trade to correct a misunderstanding that he appears to have of my hon. Friend's question? My hon. Friend put it to him that the Post Office is one of the most profitable in the world, that it has the most reliable delivery service, at one of the cheapest prices, in Europe, and that in Britain it has achieved a growth in productivity that is double the average for the services sector over the past decade. My hon. Friend's question to the President was, why put all that at risk by privatising the Post Office, because of this Government's obsession with selling anything that they can sell off? Since the President has apparently announced that he cannot do it for another year, because he cannot figure out a way to do it, would not it be much better to end the damaging uncertainty, the delay in investment and the anxiety of staff by announcing that he intends to drop the whole idea and accept that the Post Office is a public service which should belong in the public sector?

Mr. Heseltine: That is the language with which the Labour party has sought to attack every change that this party has made over the past 10 years. It is because we have faced the Labour party down time and again that British Gas, the power companies and the water companies are winning in the world marketplace. Every time that we take a difficult decision on behalf of British industry, it is resisted by the Labour party. That is a very good reason why we should stay in power and have the courage to go on doing so.

Mr. Cormack: Does my right hon. Friend accept that many of us, who have strongly supported privatisation, still have reservations about privatising the royal mail? Does he accept that the figures that he gave to the House this afternoon illustrate a very good case for removing economic restraint on the Post Office, but not a very strong case for privatising it?

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend is right to express concern, but what I have to make clear to the House is that the overwhelming majority of post offices are already in the private sector. My hon. Friend will also realise that within the public sector there are unavoidable public accounting disciplines which constrain the ability of a public sector organisation to compete effectively with the private sector. What is happening in the Post Office is that increasingly a sector of its market is being eaten into by private sector companies and by new technology, whether it is the fax machine, or the bike or the courier. All these things are putting the Post Office under competitive pressure. That is why many people think that we can preserve the standards of the royal mail but widen the opportunities for the people who work in it.

Mr. Hain: I remind the President of the Board of Trade that, unlike the other utility services that have been privatised, the Post Office's costs are 80 per cent. labour intensive and there is no way in which he can guarantee to rural and outlying areas the quality of service that they enjoy at present. May I also remind him, that on top of the £800 million that has been contributed, through negative external financing limit payments, to the Treasury coffers, the Treasury has received an additional £400 million in corporation tax over this period. By privatising the Post Office, the President will perhaps reap a one-off return of an equivalent scale, but he will forgo year upon year of income to the Treasury from a service which the public respects and is the best in the world.

Mr. Heseltine: I am the first to recognise the quality of the service, but the question that I have to answer is how can we enable the Post Office to build on the quality of its service and widen the opportunities for Britain in so doing? The issue is whether there would be an opportunity for the Post Office in a private sector context in an international competitive world, which would be bigger than that in which it can involve itself today.

3. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement about the future of the Post Office.

Mr. Heseltine: No decisions have yet been taken on the future organisation and structure of the Post Office. I will make an announcement to the House when we have reached conclusions.

Mr. Marshall: Does my right hon. Friend accept that the fears expressed about the consequences of privatising the Post Office are precisely the same as those expressed about the privatisation of British Telecom? Does he agree that the current uncertainty is bad for the staff, customers and management of the Post Office? Will he bring it to an end speedily by announcing the imminent privatisation of the Post Office?

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend is right to make the point that the Labour party has opposed every liberalisation and every measure to free the public sector which we have introduced and would therefore have prevented the large number of the advances now being achieved by the privatised companies. [HON. MEMBERS: "Jobs for the boys."] Opposition Members talk about jobs for the boys. I am glad that they recognise that we are concerned to protect the jobs of people in the privatised industries by setting them free to take advantage of the new, worldwide marketplace. I cannot today give my hon. Friend the assurance that he requests, although I am the first to recognise that many people in the Post Office are asking for exactly what he suggests.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Does not the Secretary of State realise that there is all the difference in the world between releasing a nationalised public sector industry from the constraints traditionally imposed on it and guarding the unity and coherence of a service in the national interest? I thought that his political experience would have taught him that there is all the difference in the world between popular capitalism and unpopular dogmatism. Does not he realise that privatising the Post Office would be a privatisation too far?

Mr. Heseltine: That was a classic example of the Liberal party trying to have it both ways. The hon. Gentleman must make his own decision about whether it is a journey too far, but we shall decide whether we are going to embark on the journey.

Sir Michael Grylls: Does my right hon. Friend accept that there cannot be an organisation in the world, however good, that cannot be improved and that that must apply to the Post Office and the delivery of the mail and parcels? Will he press ahead with his plans for the privatisation of the Post Office and to increase competition because that will also improve the service to consumers?

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend is right to ask about competition. I have tried to say how technology and the globalisation of markets are already subjecting the Post Office to a range of new services. However, the critical question at the heart of the matters is how, while protecting the absolute non-negotiability of the univer sality of the service and the price, we can allow the men and women who work in the Post Office to expand, to compete and to seek wider opportunities, which is not compatible with public sector discipline. That is the dilemma we face.

Mr. Cousins: Does the President accept that, on the matter of Post Office privatisation, his figleaf is becoming dangerously small? After nearly nine months and the expenditure of £500,000 on advice from Kleinwort Benson, he has no proposals to put before the House. The Post Office awaits its opportunity as a public sector company which can mop up the postal markets of western Europe. When will he allow the Post Office the commercial freedom to be that kind of public sector success?

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Gentleman is completely divorced from the reality of public sector accounting. No Government have ever been able to set free a public sector enterprise outside the disciplines of the public expenditure round and Treasury control. There never has been nor ever will be such a Government. [HON. MEMBERS: "Why not?"] Because the Labour Government designed a structure that was not compatible with a free enterprise system. If there had been such a system, the Opposition would presumably have found it in the years when they experimented so disastrously with public ownership.

Exports (Scandinavia)

4. Mr. Bates: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on measures introduced to promote exports to Scandinavia.

The Minister for Trade (Mr. Richard Needham): The full range of overseas trade services is available for companies wishing to export to Scandinavia. More specifically, my Department regularly undertakes special initiatives in relation to those markets.

Mr. Bates: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that answer. Is he aware that the north-east exports a greater proportion of its manufacturing output than almost any other region and that an increasing amount of that trade is with Scandinavian countries, especially that involving the development of the extensive North sea oil and gas reserves, in which about 22,000 people in the north-east are already employed? Does my hon. Friend agree that those trading links with Scandinavia would be given a significant boost by the early inclusion of the Scandinavian countries in the single European market?

Mr. Needham: I agree with my hon. Friend and the sooner that we can get Maastricht out of the way, the sooner we can enlarge the Community. As my hon. Friend says, the oil and gas industry in the north-east is of paramount importance. The story is one of immense success and I have no doubt that it will continue. Last year, exports to the nordic countries grew by more than 5 per cent. and imports by only 2 per cent., so I am delighted to say that we are closing the gap, with the help of companies from the north-east.

Mr. Tony Banks: Will the Minister take an early opportunity to remind our Norwegian trading partners that if they insist on slaughtering minke whales in the north Atlantic, they will imperil both imports from and exports to this country, because many people feel that the Norwegians should desist from the obscenity of whaling?

Mr. Needham: I understand the hon. Gentleman's feelings on that subject, but I assure the House that the Government will continue to do everything that they can to promote and increase trade with the nordic countries, including Norway.

Mr. Fabricant: Does my hon. Friend agree that our sales into Scandinavia will be improved not only by the recent increases in Export Credits Guarantee Department cover, but by the fact that the pound is more competitive against the Norwegian, Danish and Swedish kroners? The fact that we have low inflation also improves our ability to sell abroad. If the high-spending, high-taxation, high-inflation policies of the Labour party were followed, we would be unable to sell not only to Scandinavia but to the rest of Europe and the rest of the world.

Mr. Needham: Of course, I agree with my hon. Friend. Another difference between us and the Labour party is that whereas we have a strategy for backing winners, the Labour party, as I know because I have just read the strategy of the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook), is returning to a strategy for picking losers.

Offshore Oil Wells

5. Mr. Ainger: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many offshore oil exploration wells were drilled in the British sector in 1989, 1990, 1991 and 1992; and what is his estimate of the numbers in 1993.

The Minister for Energy (Mr. Tim Eggar): A total of 92 exploration wells were drilled in 1989; 152 in 1990; 106 in 1991; and 72 in 1992. My Department does not publish forecasts for the numbers of exploration wells.

Mr. Ainger: Is the Minister aware that since the changes in petroleum revenue tax announced in the Budget, the Chancellor of the Exchequer is now known by the United Kingdom offshore oil industry as the driller killer? Is he aware that the industry expects a 30 to 40 per cent. cut in the number of wells drilled, which could mean a cut of 40,000 jobs in the offshore sector? Does he agree that the damage that will flow from the changes in PRT is unacceptable? Did the Chancellor of the Exchequer consult the Minister before the announcement was made and what does the Minister intend to do to restore confidence in our offshore exploration industry?

Mr. Eggar: Clearly I have misunderstood the hon. Gentleman. Judging by his previous written questions on the subject, I thought that he was doing his best to prevent exploration of any kind off the coast of the United Kingdom. Oil companies and oil supply companies have expressed both favourable views and reservations about what the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced in the Budget. A number of companies are meeting the Chancellor and my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury to discuss the changes in the light of the publication of the Finance Bill.

Mr. O'Neill: Does the Minister agree that the successful bidders in previous rounds have entered into drilling and exploration obligations which the new tax regime may preclude? Does the Department of Trade and Industry realise that the honouring of those obligations may become increasingly difficult? Does the Minister agree with the Treasury's view that those legal obligations may be set aside, or does he take a contrary view?

Mr. Eggar: I am amazed at the hon. Gentleman. He appears to be advocating that oil companies should break obligations into which they entered freely. I think that the hon. Gentleman should reconsider his view.

Eureka

6. Mr. Garrett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what has been the level of participation of British companies in the EC Eureka project.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Technology (Mr. Edward Leigh): Three hundred and eight British companies have participated in Eureka projects.

Mr. Garrett: What does the President of the Board of Trade think of the case of LJ Technical Systems in my constituency about which I have corresponded with his office? That very go-ahead, innovative electronics company in Norwich joined two French companies to make a bid for funding under the Eureka project. The French companies were visited within a month by a technically qualified civil servant who approved their bid. The British company in my constituency was messed about for seven months by some daft mandarin who actually did not know what the product was for and, at the end of the process, turned it down. How is that for the dynamic DTI?

Mr. Leigh: The House will not be surprised to learn that the hon. Gentleman has told only about a quarter of the story. The truth is that an application was made on 9 July. Not within one month, or two months, but within one day, the DTI contacted that company and requested information on 10 July. The whole point of the Eureka project is that it should equal significant technological advance. We asked that question, but there was no reply. We asked again on 31 July, but again there was no reply. We asked again on 2 September, but there was no reply. A reply was finally given in October. In November, because of the highly competitive nature of the competition and the fact that there were more innovative projects, we did not give a grant.

Mr. Garrett: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. In view of the inadequacy of that reply, I give notice that I will seek to raise this matter on the Adjournment.

Post Office

7. Ms Eagle: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the planned change in the Post Office contribution to Government finances between 1990-91 to 1992-93 and 1993-94 to 1995-96.

Mr. Heseltine: The Post Office's external financing limit contributions for the two years 1990-91 and 1991-92 were, respectively, zero and £74 million. The target for 1992-93 is £66 million. For the three years 1993-94 to 1995-96, the target contributions are, respectively, £181 million, £176 million and £158 million.

Ms Eagle: Does the Minister agree that seeking to increase the contributions that the Post Office makes to the Exchequer by close to three times in one year will imply a massive increase in postal charges once the price freeze ends in August? When those price increases arrive later in the year to pay for that, will we see the introduction of a Tory post tax to pay for the Government's economic mismanagement?

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Lady may like to catch up with the facts. There has been a price freeze for 18 months and a further six months of freeze was recently announced.

Mr. Nigel Evans: My right hon. Friend has said how important the Post Office is to the country. In his drive to improve the postal service, will he assure me that regard will be given to rural post offices and that, if any changes are made, there will be assurances that the service that is currently provided to rural customers will continue to be provided?

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend is well aware of the considerable importance of the rural post office network. We have made it clear in the consultation papers that we have produced that the maintenance of a very substantial rural post office network in the private sector, where it now is, is an important part of our policy, just like the universality of delivery and price.

Ms Hoey: Will the Secretary of State have a word with his colleague the Secretary of State for Social Security and try to persuade him of the folly of requiring pensions and benefits to be paid through banks rather than through post offices? Does he realise that that would ruin our rural post offices and cause many problems for many pensioners throughout the country?

Mr. Heseltine: Many people choose to have their pensions paid through the banking system. There are obvious issues to be explored. The Government have made it clear that automated credit transfer is part of their policy. Of course, we are aware of the complications and implication involved in that, but I would not give the sort of assurance that the hon. Lady seeks.

Pit Closures

8. Mr. Janner: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a further statement on the situation regarding the effect of pit closures on related industries.

Mr. Eggar: The Government's views are set out in the White Paper, "Prospects for Coal" and in their response to the Select Committee on Employment. It is because we recognise the impact of pit closures that we have expanded to £200 million the value of the package of measures to help affected areas.

Mr. Janner: Does the Minister recognise that while the Government are making arrangements for special redundancy payments for miners who are made redundant as a result of the pit closures, they have made no announcement, whether to the Select Committee on Employment, in the White Paper or elsewhere, about special redundancy measures to help people who are made redundant in related industries, as opposed to additional help for the areas in which they live? What do the Government propose to do for the individuals and their families? Probably as many as 100,000 people will be made redundant if the pit closure programme goes forward in any form. What special redundancy pay will they get?

Mr. Eggar: I am surprised that the hon. and learned Gentleman, who is a distinguished Committee Chairman, continues to repeat a figure of 100,000 which seems to be a complete figment of his imagination. I wish that he would point to the positive side just once. For example, why have we not heard from him about the many jobs that will be created by the announcement that the Connah's Quay project will go ahead?

Mr. Alexander: As the related industries must by definition include those interested in purchasing the coal mines that are to close, is not it astonishing that British Coal is closing down those mines at the end of April and yet refusing to allow any interested purchasers to view the mines in the meantime? Is not it clear that British Coal is denying the opportunity for those coming in to purchase ongoing coal mines and does not want competition from outside at all?

Mr. Eggar: It is my understanding that, if British Coal were to decide to cease coaling at Bevercotes, which is my hon. Friend's concern, that mine would go on to a care and maintenance basis so there is no possibility of its simply not being available for sale to the private sector. However, I understand my hon. Friend's concern and that of his constituents. Clearly, it is important that British Coal moves rapidly to put mines such as Bevercotes on the market and make them available to the private sector. I take the message that my hon. Friend has delivered to me.

Mr. Robin Cook: Is the Minister aware of the anger among miners and the management of British Coal that their pension fund is to be raided to match the cost of the new subsidy? Is it the bottom line that in March the Government announced a subsidy of up to £500 million and instructed British Coal in April to save the Treasury much the same figure? Is not it true that Conservative Members did not tell us that in the debate or the White Paper because they know that no one else will accept it as fair that the miners' pension fund should pay the cost of the Government's mismanagement of the pit closures?

Mr. Eggar: What I think people are extremely angry about is the hon. Gentleman's irresponsible scaremongering. It has been made absolutely clear that there will be no rip-off of the pension funds—pensions will be safeguarded. That is the clear undertaking which has been given. What is more, British Coal will seek a court direction as to the way in which the surplus can be disposed of. I wish that just once the hon. Gentleman would bother to do his homework.

Mr. Dickens: Can the Minister explain why Labour Members always suppose that, by throwing resources after —[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has been here for some time. He should not be asking the Minister to explain anything about Labour Members: he must ask a direct question relating to Government policy.

Mr. Dickens: When the textile workers of the north were put out of work and the mills closed, they did not have handouts such as those that have been suggested in this question. [Interruption.] That matter is relevant to the question.

Madam Speaker: Order. I am moving on.

Mr. Barron: The Minister is aware of the blackmail tactics that are being used currently at Maltby colliery to get rid of the work force and stop production at one of the most profitable and modern coal mines in Europe. That would obviously take away the market for many forms of mining manufacturing industry. On Friday this week, I am going to visit NEI mining division in Sheffield, which employs some of the best engineers in Britain. What have I to say to them when they see their jobs being taken away by the Government's attacks on the British coal mining industry?

Mr. Eggar: I find it extraordinary that the hon. Gentleman should describe what is happening at Maltby as blackmail. Through British Coal, the Government have committed a net £29 million to investment in the development of Maltby in order to create the super-pit of the future. Why does not the hon. Gentleman for once point to the advantages that lie ahead for his constituents rather than any downside?

Manufacturing (West Yorkshire)

9. Mrs. Mahon: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he will next visit West Yorkshire to discuss job losses in manufacturing.

The Minister for Industry (Mr. Tim Sainsbury): My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade and other Ministers in my Department make frequent visits to Yorkshire. My right hon. Friend next plans to visit Leeds in mid-May to attend the Association of British Chambers of Commerce annual conference dinner.

Mrs. Mahon: Is the Minister aware that in Yorkshire and Humberside between 1989 and 1992, 35,000 jobs were lost in manufacturing? Will he do something for the thousands of unemployed in Halifax by unequivocally supporting Calderdale council's bid for objective 2 status and by granting Calderdale assisted area status? He must be aware that Calderdale is like the hole in the middle of the doughnut, surrounded by areas that receive help, but receiving nothing.

Mr. Sainsbury: We all regret—[Interruption.] We are all sorry to see job losses, but I hope that the hon. Lady will appreciate that inevitably improvements in productivity are sometimes accompanied by job losses. I cannot anticipate for her the outcome of the review of the assisted area map. I hope that she recognises that we have only just received from the European Community its proposals for the rules that will apply to objective 2 status. They are being considered and are not likely to be agreed by the Council of Ministers until later in the summer.

Mr. Batiste: What does my right hon. Friend advise those who, like the hon. Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon), bemoan job losses in West Yorkshire, but advocate policies such as the social chapter, which would cost so many jobs by making British industry uncompetitive on the world markets?

Mr. Sainbsury: I would advise, as I am sure that my hon. Friend would, that they consult industry. If they did, they would find that industry is aware that if it is to succeed, create jobs, win export orders and win a larger share of the home market, the key is productivity. That is what they seek and that is what the Government are helping them to achieve.

Small Businesses (North-west)

10. Mr. Kilfoyle: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many new small businesses have been established during the last 12 months for which figures are available, in the north-west region.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: An indication of the number of new businesses set up in the north-west can be obtained from VAT data. During 1991—the latest year for which figures are available—there were 21,000 registrations for VAT in the north-west. More recent figures are published by Barclays bank, which estimates that during 1992 there were 51,000 new start-ups in the north-west. The figure includes businesses with a turnover below the VAT threshold.

Mr. Kilfoyle: More than an indication of the state of the economy in the north-west are surely the Dun and Bradstreet figures for the year up to March 1993, which show that 5,046 businesses went under in the north-west in that time. Does not that give the lie to the claim propagated by the Tory party in the current county council elections in the north-west that it is the party of responsible economic management for the north-west?

Mr. Hamilton: There are 3 million businesses in Britain and even in times of boom, businesses cease trading and new businesses are created. Even at a time of recession, many businesses are coming forward to take up the opportunities which are increasingly available to them. Lower interest rates, a more competitive exchange rate and all the north-west's advantages make me optimistic for the future. It is a great pity that the hon. Gentleman and his Opposition colleagues always seem to talk down the region rather than capitalise on its strengths and advocate them as loudly as possible.

Mr. Hendry: Is my hon. Friend aware that most of the small and medium-sized firms in my constituency and throughout the north-west report strong signs of economic upturn? Does he agree that their continuing prosperity depends on the continuation of Government policies that deliver low inflation, low borrowing costs and freedom from the job-destroying social chapter?

Mr. Hamilton: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. Were it not for the legacy of Labour party militancy on Merseyside it would be easier for us to advocate the advantages of the north-west.

Mr. Loyden: Will the Minister take note of the issue raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Kilfoyle) that many of the businesses that the Minister mentioned are opening, then closing after about six months? If he lived in the city or the region, he would understand that. Are the several hundred people selling cigarette lighters in the centre of Liverpool classified as small businesses?

Mr. Hamilton: It is a great shame that Liverpool has Members of Parliament like the hon. Gentleman, because if those watching our proceedings this afternoon regard him as typical of the city it is no wonder that we have difficulty in attracting people into it. However, in spite of the best efforts of people like the hon. Gentleman, we have been instrumental in attracting jobs to Liverpool, to places such as Wavertree technical park. We provided £6 million in grants, which has led to £30 million in private sector investment and the creation of 1,600 long-term jobs in the city of Liverpool.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Does my hon. Friend agree that some new businesses that are started in the north-west do so with assisted area status aid? My hon. Friend will be aware that aid has already been granted to one business that has been relocated from my constituency to Wigan, with the aid of £1 million? I have written to my hon. Friend with details of another firm that is about to relocate to the north-west with assisted area status aid. Is it sensible use of Government money to give aid that involves a net loss of jobs—putting people out of work in one district and putting them into work in another?

Mr. Hamilton: I am aware of my hon. Friend's concerns. Such policies inevitably create difficulties from time to time. Some parts of the country have great disadvantages on account of historical change and transition from old-fashioned industries to new ones. My hon. Friend the Minister for Energy has discussed the case with me and I take his concerns seriously. We want to see economic prosperity in all parts of the country, and regional selective assistance plays a part in achieving that objective.

Miners (Unemployment Insurance)

11. Mr. Enright: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he will hold discussions with insurance companies on the problems facing miners who wish to insure against unemployment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: The issue of policies and their terms are for the commercial judgment of insurance companies. It would not be appropriate to intervene in their commercial decisions. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) said, miners who are made redundant are eligible for generous redundancy payments of up to £37,000 per man.

Mr. Enright: Will the Minister persuade his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade to take time off from dipping his hand in the till of miners' pensions with the same ease with which he used to whirl the Mace, and consider the problem of miners in pits such as Stillingfleet, who have a long future ahead of them but are unable to obtain insurance due to the document uttered by the Minister, "Prospects for Coal"? Insurance companies no longer think that any pit has a future. We are not talking about redundant miners, but miners who are in work—what is the Minister going to do about it?

Mr. Eggar: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will reflect on the use of language. I do not understand how he believes that the cause that he seeks to promote is furthered by using language as he has just done.

Mr. Quentin Davies: How many jobs are being created for miners who have been made redundant by British Coal Enterprise and other Government initiatives in coal mines or former coal mining areas?

Mr. Eggar: British Coal Enterprise is playing an active role in finding additional jobs and relocating individuals. Between 1987 and 1992, no fewer than 84 per cent. of all those who registered with British Coal Enterprise were found long-term employment within a year to 18 months. That is a very impressive record.

Mr. Stevenson: Is the Minister aware that any insurance that may be available against job losses is no substitute for a job? In my constituency, it is estimated that the proposed cruel closure of Trentham colliery will lead to 4,400 people losing their jobs with a loss to the local economy of £84 million. Is the Minister prepared to assure us that the resources available to create employment will reflect that tragic and massive loss in that area?

Mr. Eggar: The Trentham colliery is part of the continuing consultation process on the closures. Should it be decided that Trentham be closed, of course the private sector will be able to lease or, in due course, purchase Trentham. I am sure that that is something which the hon. Gentleman will welcome.

Mr. Oppenheim: Is my hon. Friend aware that thousands of former miners in my constituency were made redundant and given a pittance for redundancy pay under previous Labour Governments, so the Opposition have no right to preach to us about hands in tills when it comes to miners? Do not millions of workers in other industries rely for their jobs on competitively priced energy, and to give coal a monopoly on energy, as Labour would like, would put thousands of jobs at risk elsewhere in the economy?

Mr. Eggar: The hypocrisy of the Opposition knows no bounds.

Mr. Enright: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. In view of the unsatisfactory nature of the Minister's answer, I propose to ask for an Adjournment debate.

Aerospace Industry

12. Mr. Hanson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has to meet the Society of British Aerospace Companies to discuss future prospects for the industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: My right hon. Friend has no current plans to meet the Society of British Aerospace Companies, but my Department keeps in close touch with the society and its member companies. Two weeks ago I led a SBAC mission which discussed United Kingdom export opportunities with the Boeing company in Seattle.

Mr. Hanson: Is the Minister aware that even as we speak there is a lobby of the House by aerospace workers who are seeking to stop the haemorrhage of jobs—50,000 in the past few years, including many in my own constituency in north Wales? Will the Minister take action on the aerospace industry and today publish the report by his own aviation committee which is critical of the Government's policy? Will he act upon its recommendations and give the House an assurance that he will undertake to accept the recommendations of the Trade and Industry Select Committee which is meeting today?

Mr. Sainsbury: The hon. Gentleman is, I hope, aware that the aerospace industry world wide is suffering both from the welcome reduction in defence orders, and the recession in the airline industry which has obviously reduced the number of orders that the industry has to satisfy. The industry receives a great deal of Government support and will continue to do so.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Does my right hon. Friend accept that the British aerospace industry, particularly British Aerospace itself, is one of Britain's largest exporters and has an outstanding record of achievement? Will he ensure that British Aerospace, particularly the regional jet division which is located on the periphery of my constituency, always receives sympathetic consideration from the Department in respect of launch aid for new projects and the research and development which is so essential to the success of the industry?

Mr. Sainsbury: I am very happy to take this opportunity to pay tribute to the export success of British Aerospace and the British aerospace industry in general. As my hon. Friend will know, since 1979 that industry has received considerable support from the Government—no less than £1·5 billion. As I said in my earlier reply, it will continue to receive support.

Mr. Barry Jones: May I tell the right hon. Gentleman of the devastating loss of 269 British Aerospace jobs in my constituency at the Broughton works, and of the amazement of the work force who have learnt that nearly 100 of those jobs are to be directly exported to the constituency of President Clinton at Little Rock? Will he intervene? Will he receive the petition that I have today received from a lobby of my constituents, who are angry and disappointed and who look to the Government to give them help?

Mr. Sainsbury: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will be aware that decisions on its corporate jet business are clearly commercial matters for the company. It must make the decisions as it sees fit in the best interests of the business. The hon. Gentleman will be assured to know that the company has said that it has no intention of closing down the Chester or Broughton production facilities.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Has my right hon. Friend received any representations from the Society of British Aerospace Companies about the European Community Konver programme? Has he yet had a chance to look at the strange classification of the areas that should be helped by the European Community? That classification seems to exclude counties such as Dorset and the travel-to-work area of Weymouth and Portland, which has a 43 per cent. defence dependency and which clearly should be helped by any money that comes from this programme.

Mr. Sainsbury: I have not received any representations on that point from the SBAC, but if I do, I will be happy to look at them. I share some of my hon. Friend's concerns about the proposals emerging under the Konver programme—especially for the reasons that he has advanced: it does not seem to direct enough support to the areas that would most deserve it.

Nuclear Review

13. Mr. Tipping: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will announce the timetable for the 1993 nuclear review.

Mr. Eggar: The Government set out in the White Paper, "Prospects for Coal", their intention to bring forward the review of the future prospects for nuclear power originally scheduled for 1994. A further announcement about the review will be made in the summer.

Mr. Tipping: Does the Minister understand the real anger in Nottinghamshire and throughout the country arising from the fact that, while nuclear electricity receives a subsidy of £1·3 billion, half the coal industry has been closed down? Will he bring forward the review of nuclear electricity as quickly as possible so that mothballed collieries such as Bilsthorpe, Calverton and Rufford will at last have a chance to compete on equal terms?

Mr. Eggar: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is aware that large numbers of trade unionists very much welcome the decision on nuclear power. The trade unionists for safe nuclear energy came to thank me for the decisions announced in the White Paper, and agreed with the hon. Gentleman that the review should be brought forward so as to end the apparent fear of some uncertainty about the future of the nuclear industry. At the time of the review, we will look at a large number of issues that relate to the future of the nuclear industry.

Mrs. Lait: Is my hon. Friend aware that nuclear power is clean, safe and good value? Is he further aware that the project team at Sizewell B is bringing in that project on time and at cost, which will make it a world-beating project team for further nuclear power stations? Will he assure the House that the benefits and achievements of our nuclear industry will be borne in mind when he undertakes the review?

Mr. Eggar: Certainly we will. My latest information is that Sizewell B is likely to be brought in under project cost and ahead of time.

Dr. Kim Howells: Will two critical decisions affecting the future of the nuclear industry be delayed until after the publication of the nuclear review? I refer to the deep repository for spent nuclear fuel and to the start-up of the thermal oxide reprocessing plant project. The Minister will know that it has already cost the taxpayers of this country £2·8 billion and it is costing British Nuclear Fuels plc a great deal of money every week because is is not starting up.

Mr. Eggar: I am aware of the widespread concern on all sides of the House about the delays to the THORP project. BNFL estimates that the delay in the start-up of the project is costing about £2 million per week. Of course, the matter is being considered urgently by my right hon. Friends.

Exports

14. Mr. Pawsey: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what are the top 10 export industries; and what level of exports they are each responsible for in percentage terms.

Mr. Needham: Aerospace, industrial chemicals, office equipment and computers and motor vehicles industries each contributed 6 per cent. Oil and gas, the electronic consumer goods and components industry, telecommunication equipment and control systems and machinery for general industrial use contributed 4 per cent. Motor vehicle parts and pharmaceuticals industries contributed 3 per cent.

Mr. Pawsey: May I thank my hon. Friend for that complete reply which underlines the importance of manufacturing industry to the economy and, harking back to the question by the hon. Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon), also to jobs? Will my hon. Friend therefore join me in congratulating companies like GEC Alstom Ltd and Cegelec Ltd in my constituency, which have outstanding records in exports? Does he agree that much more might be done to help exporters, for example, by further reducing rates of export credit guarantees?

Mr. Needham: I agree with my hon. Friend about the importance of manufacturing industry to exports. I am sure my hon. Friend would like to know that since 1981 the volume of United Kingdom manufactured exports has increased by four fifths, faster than France, Germany, Italy, the United States and Japan. The range of industries that I read out shows the depth and breadth of industry involved and its success. My hon. Friend is right to point to GEC Alstom Ltd in his constituency. GEC, one of the most successful companies in the country, is already saying that in the 1990s it will double its exports to the Pacific rim. I am sure that it will succeed in that.

Ms Short: Does the Minister agree that, after the longest recession since the 1930s, the fact that Britain has a balance of payments deficit means that we have had a serious failure over the last 14 years in our strategy for manufacturing industry? Does he agree that that is very worrying for the future? Can he tell us whether the Government have any policies or strategy to increase investment in manufacturing, or will they just write off the future?

Mr. Needham: The hon. Lady and her hon. Friends write off the future every time they stand on their feet, by knocking British manufacturing and its successes. British industry is now in a position to capture an increasing number of markets in the world; the Department of Trade and Industry is standing alongside it in achieving that objective. As I remarked just now, if the hon. Lady was listening, the capital goods industry has already said that in the next seven years it will double its exports from £10 billion to £20 billion. No doubt the hon. Lady would like to come out selling.

Mrs. Peacock: My hon. Friend will be aware of the importance of textiles in our export market. Can he tell the House whether he has received any representations on the report that south Korea is about to add fairly high tariffs to our wool textile goods exported to that country?

Mr. Needham: I have not as yet. As I intend to go to Korea tomorrow, I shall raise the matter with the Korean Government.

Mr. Bell: In reference to the question put by the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) about export credit guarantees, may we welcome the extension of the guarantees to Russia following the G7 talks in Japan? Will the Minister confirm that the major issue facing exporters is the future of the 20 per cent. political risk cover guaranteed by the Department of Trade and Industry? It is supposed to expire at the end of 1994. When may we expect a statement from the Minister that it will be extended?

Mr. Needham: We are considering the matter through ECGD with NCM and Trade Indemnity. I believe that the hon. Member is referring to the reinsurance aspects of political risk. Companies have been successful in managing to place some 90 per cent. of that in the private market this year, but I am keeping the matter under close review.

Post Office

15. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the future of the Post Office.

Mr. Heseltine: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer that I gave earlier to my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall).

Mr. Greenway: Is my right hon. Friend aware of the wonderful support that I have had from my constituents in battles to save five post offices? Public meetings which I organised were attended by hundreds of people. Each of the post offices was saved and enhanced as part of Post Office Counters. Will my right hon. Friend assure me that, in the event of privatisation, the services of those post offices will be further enhanced? Will he also look at the issue of postal collections across London on Sundays, which are currently rare? More collections are needed. If the Post Office is privatised will there be more postal collections on Sundays?

Mr. Heseltine: I have no doubt whatever of my hon. Friend's unremitting efforts on behalf of the post offices in his constituency. I am delighted to hear of the success which I am sure he richly deserves. I should properly refer matters such as post office services on Sundays in London to the Post Office board and I shall rapidly do so.

Mr. Bryan Davies: Is not another attractive feature of Post Office privatisation for the Government the fact that yet another board will be created which superannuated Ministers can join and draw healthy emoluments for their services?

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Gentleman will remember that that precedent was established by Labour when it created nationalised industries and transferred Ministers to run them.

Points of Order

3.31 pm

Mr. John McAllion (Dundee, East): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Last night, a Northern Ireland Office Minister announced that, for technical reasons, the Government intended to withdraw their plans to privatise Northern Ireland's water. That means that only Scotland faces the prospect of water privatisation in this Parliament.

Could we have a business statement from the Secretary of State for Scotland today to explain the technical reasons for the withdrawal of plans to privatise water in Northern Ireland? We in Scotland think that the technical reason may be that the Government do not have a democratic mandate in Northern Ireland. But neither do they have a democratic mandate in Scotland for water privatisation.

Madam Speaker: That is not a matter for me. The hon. Gentleman will have to pursue his point through some other channel.

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. You were not to know that, in my constituency, there are textile mills that manufacture the canvas on which coal is conveyed underground. My question was much more relevant than you anticipated. Perhaps I should have introduced that element earlier in my point.

Madam Speaker: That is right. The hon. Gentleman ought to lead with a question rather than just make comments. I was born not far from his constituency, and I know it well.

Criminal Justice (Amendment) (No. 2)

3.32 pm

Mr. Mike O'Brien (Warwickshire, North): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend sections 1 and 29 of the Criminal Justice Act 1991 to enable the Courts to take account of relevant factors when dealing with custodial sentences and related matters.

My Bill will give the House an opportunity to amend key defects in the 1991 Act. Since it came into force last year, that Act has allowed criminals who ought to have gone to prison to get away with it. It has unacceptably restricted the ability of the courts to imprison persistent offenders.

Yesterday, the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) introduced a Bill which also deals with these matters. My Bill differs from his in several ways. Before I outline those differences, I should like to compliment the hon. Gentleman on his impressive and eloquent speech, which clearly identified the issues that I wish to address. I associate myself with many of the arguments that he so ably put before the House. I differ from the hon. Gentleman, in that I do not seek a return to the position that existed before October of last year. Rather, my aim is to amend the Act to strike a new balance within the framework of the legislation.

The Government introduced the Criminal Justice Act with some important and still valid aims. They just sought to achieve those aims in the wrong way. My Bill would give the courts wider discretion, without returning to the defects that the Act sought to remedy.

The second difference is that the Bill is fully drafted and, after considerable discussion and consultation, has the endorsement of those on the Labour Front Bench. I can offer the Government the Labour party's co-operation in speedily implementing my Bill should they decide to take that opportunity.

I am putting the Bill forward now because, like the hon. Member for Canterbury, I believe that there is a need for urgency in amending the Criminal Justice Act. The Home Secretary said recently, before the Home Affairs Select Committee, that he was reluctant to amend the Act until a year had passed since it came into force. I do not feel that he has yet grasped the urgency of the need to deal with the matter. I hope that the fact that, in two days, two Bills have been introduced, by hon. Members on each side of the House, dealing with the same issue will emphasise the importance with which the House regards the need to amend the Act.

I call on the Government to provide legislative time to respond to the demand, from both sides of the House, for urgent action. That is why my Bill has been introduced so close on the heels of the debate last week on criminal justice, which saw repeated calls for the issues to be tackled.

That is why the opportunity has been taken to focus two Bills on the same subject, on consecutive days, albeit from different points of view. It is an attempt to put pressure on the Home Secretary to act. He must understand that Conservative and Labour Members are not prepared to wait until October for a year to pass, while criminals are released when they should be behind bars, and then claim more victims. He must treat the matter with the priority that it deserves.

Sections 1(2) (a) and 29 of the Criminal Justice Act are the offending sections that must be amended. Under section 1(2) (a), in deciding whether to send a criminal to prison, the court can consider only two of the offences before it. The defendant may have more offences before the court. He may be a shoplifter or a social security fraudster who has committed a large number of offences over a substantial period, and admits so.

There may be 20, 30 or 50 offences to be taken into consideration yet, as happened recently at Reading, the court can take a decision based only on two offences. That is ridiculous. The decision whether to send someone to prison will be different if it is based on two offences than it would be if it were based on a large array of offences, and that factor must be contained within new legislation. My Bill would amend section 1(2) (a) to allow the court to look at all the offences before it in deciding whether to imprison.

The other offending section, section 29, deals with the length of the sentence to be imposed. It prevents the court from taking into account a previous criminal record, except in particular circumstances.

Although the Labour party believes that we need to be tough on crime and the causes of crime, we are not seeking to join the "hang 'em and flog 'em" brigade. We just want to see defendants get justice in the courts and our constituents protected.

Therefore, let me concede that the Minister who was responsible for section 29, the right hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Mr. Patten), then a Home Office Minister and now the Secretary of State for Education, introduced that section to deal with a real inadequacy in the law before the Criminal Justice Act was passed, and he had some support for that from the Labour party.

It was then possible for the courts to sentence offenders not for the offence before the court but for their previous convictions. In a case in 1988, that resulted in a thief who had stolen fish worth £12 getting three and a half years. That was wrong, as Lord Justice Stocker said at the time. It was right that that sentence should be cut.

That fault had to be tackled but, unfortunately, the Act sought to do so by hamstringing the courts with a series of complex hurdles before they could imprison anyone. It was the wrong approach to the issue.

The right approach was to allow all the relevant previous convictions to be considered within the context of the seriousness of the offence. That is what my amendment will do. It is a workable solution to the problems of the Act, which will allow courts to imprison but not to imprison unjustly. It will give the courts more discretion than the present section 29, without the defects of the old rule. It will allow the courts to protect the public by sending to prison those who should go to prison.

The Lord Chief Justice has called sections 1 and 29 misconceived motions. Judges who appeared before the Select Committee on Home Affairs, of which I am a member, began their evidence by demanding that these provisions should be changed. Only the other day, a judge told me that the effect of the provisions was to turn many courts and their decisions into a shambles.

The House will be aware that 30 magistrates have resigned in protest. Police officers and lawyers have denounced the new law in the most forceful terms. It is frustrating for police officers, and for the public, to see criminals arrested and brought before the courts, only to find that the courts are forced to do no more than fine them. The courts release them due to the Criminal Justice Act. The Act has more regard for inmates of overcrowded prisons than it has for the victims of crime on council housing estates, for example.

I know that many Conservative Members were elected in the belief that a Conservative Government would be tougher on crime. I suspect that it must be galling for them that Labour can criticise the Cabinet for presiding over a doubling of crime, and for passing the most liberal piece of legislation on crime in the form of a Criminal Justice Act. The credibility of the Government's policy on law and order is at stake.

As an Opposition Member, it gives me no great pleasure to say that the Government are weak on law and order—well, perhaps a little pleasure. I know that it is the people who are the victims of this weakness. My constituents, for example, are the victims of increasing burglaries, car thefts and vandalism—crimes which are sometimes committed by criminals who were saved from prison by the Criminal Justice Act.

The Home Secretary has said that he will revisit the Act. He gives no date and we cannot afford to spare him the time, during which criminals who deserve to go to prison will be protected from prison. This is a time for urgent action, not prevarication. While the Home Secretary consults, debates, prevaricates and waits, victims of crime will suffer. As I have said, the Bill could be enacted quickly. It is designed to protect the victims of criminals, criminals who should have been sent to prison within the terms of the Criminal Justice Act, but were not. I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Mike O'Brien, Mr. Stephen Byers, Mr. Chris Mullin, Mrs. Barbara Roche, Mr. Gerald Bermingham, Mr. Alan Meale, Mr. Jimmy Boyce and Mr. Paddy Tipping.

Criminal Justice (Amendment) (No. 2)

Mr. Mike O'Brien accordingly presented a Bill to amend sections 1 and 29 of the Criminal Justice Act 1991 to enable the Courts to take account of relevant factors when dealing with custodial sentences and related matters: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 7 May, and to be printed. [Bill 184.]

Chairman of Ways and Means (Ruling)

Madam Speaker: It will help the House to know that I have not selected the amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley).

3.42 pm

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): I beg to move,

That this House regrets that the Chairman of Ways and Means, having selected Amendment 27 to the European Communities (Amendment) Bill, which has support from honourable Members on both sides of the House, having called a Right honourable Member to speak on that amendment, and having allowed a debate upon it to take place, should then have decided, contrary to normal practice, not to permit a division to take place upon that amendment, thus denying the House an opportunity to reach a decision on an issue relating to the applicability of the Protocol on Social Policy contained in the Maastricht Treaty, a protocol which Her Majesty's Government held to be so important that it sought and obtained a special opt-out from it for the United Kingdom; and, in the light of these considerations, and the long term significance of this ruling for parliamentary debates on all future legislation, calls upon the Chairman of Ways and Means to reconsider his ruling forthwith, and to permit the Committee to reach a decision on that amendment.

First, I wish to make it clear that the motion is supported by 80 hon. Members who represent opinion in all parts of the House. It represents the only way in which the House can register its opinion of a decision of the Chairman of Ways and Means. It is not possible to appeal to Madam Speaker in respect of decisions taken by the Chairman.

Those of us who have signed the motion believe that it is a profoundly mistaken ruling and that the statement made by the Chairman has the most serious implications for the rights of hon. Members and their constituents in the future. It relates solely and simply to that one ruling, and invites the House to ask the Chairman of Ways and Means to reconsider it. It is nothing more than that. It is not a motion of censure on the Chairman of Ways and Means, who is widely respected by hon. Members on both sides of the House, especially for the way in which he has chaired the debates on the Bill.

I shall never forget that, at the outset of the Committee stage, the Chairman invited me and other interested Members to go to his room so that he could hear our points of view and explain his approach. I have never in my life known that to happen in connection with any Bill going into Committee. The motion is therefore nothing whatever to do with his impartiality; it is a question of his judgment in this one ruling.

Sir David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): Would the right hon. Gentleman be kind enough to correct his opening statement that the motion that he has moved has support in all parts of the House? That is not true.

Mr. Benn: It depends whether one is speaking geographically or in terms of political parties. Geographically, it has support from all sides.

This is a motion for the House as a whole to consider. It is not, and should not be seen as, a matter of party controversy, and I hope that the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Sir D. Steel) has not applied a whip to members of his party to prevent them from supporting the motion.

This motion is exactly the same as an appeal to an appeal court in order to consider a judgment from a lower court. It follows closely a similar motion moved by Sir Elwyn Jones in 1972, when the House was debating the European Communities Bill. The issue then related to rulings by the then Chairman about his selection of amendments to the Bill. In moving the motion, Sir Elwyn —later the Lord Chancellor—said this——

Mr. Michael Spicer (Worcestershire, South): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Benn: Certainly.

Mr. Spicer: I am most grateful. Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that many of my right hon. and hon. Friends, who share many of the anxieties that he has in this matter, will not be voting with him on the motion—not only out of respect for the Chair but also because we believe that the fault for this issue very largely lies with hon. Members on the Opposition Front Bench? They have been consistently tabling new clauses which are seen to be substitutes for amendment No. 27. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will not push the motion to a vote at the end of the day.

Mr. Benn: The hon. Gentleman has not heard the case yet. If he has already reached a view on the basis of a few introductory words, it gives an indication, as civil servants would say, of the way his mind is moving. He should hear the argument before reaching a final view.

When Sir Elwyn Jones moved his motion of censure against Sir Robert Grant-Ferris—who was as popular as the present Chairman of Ways and Means—this is what he said:

"The Chairman's interpretation of the rules of order therefore is quite crucial to the whole rôle and function of Parliament and this House in its consideration of this historic and unprecedented Bill."

That was the European Communities Bill.

"The Chairman himself rightly described it yesterday as one of the most fundamental and important Bills which have ever been before the House of Commons. If the Ruling stands unamended and unqualified by subsequent action, it will as a matter of order muzzle proper consideration and decision by this House on a Bill which, if it becomes law, will restrict the power of Parliament to debate and resolve: first, questions vital to the finances and economy of our country; secondly, important changes in our law; thirdly, the control by the House over public expenditure; fourthly, restrictions which will be placed on the rights and powers of our courts of law —matters which affect every subject in the land.

If as a matter of order Parliament can be so circumscribed that important Amendments which the Opposition have tabled cannot be made debatable, the consequence will be to reduce the rôle of this House in the consideration of the issues raised by this momentous Bill to discussion merely of the comparatively trivial and superficial."—[Official Report, 1 March 1972; Vol. 832, c. 434-35.]

Mr. Tom King (Bridgwater): Is there not an essential difference between this Bill and the right hon. Gentleman's analogy? He knows that no amendments were made to the European Communities Bill, and that there was no Report stage. The right hon. Gentleman says that there should be an opportunity for appeal to another court. One reason why a number of us find the motion deeply offensive is that the right hon. Gentleman knows that he has another opportunity to make his arguments without seeking to impugn the impartiality and judgment of the Chairman of Ways and Means.

Mr. Benn: On the latter point, I have made it absolutely clear that I am not impugning the impartiality of the Chairman of Ways and Means. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] I am not. I gave the Chairman a copy of the speech that I am making so that he could read it in advance of the debate. I am making the point that the only way in which the House can query the judgment of a Chairman or of the Speaker is to table a motion. It is absurd to say that that is impugning the impartiality of the Chair. As the right hon. Gentleman will learn, if he allows me to finish my speech, the issue is very similar to the one in 1972.

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): The right hon. Gentleman listed the apocalyptic consequences which Sir Elwyn saw if the Chairman's ruling was upheld. The Chairman's ruling was upheld. Does the right hon. Gentleman think that those consequences followed?

Mr. Benn: If the hon. Gentleman, who is a passionate supporter of the European Community, does not realise that everything that was said by Elwyn Jones was correct in terms of the superior power of Community law over European law, which is what that Bill was all about, I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman has followed the debates on issues to which he is so committed. Perhaps that is why he was able to support earlier legislation on this matter.

This debate is not about the merits of amendment No. 27 but about the right of the House to reach a decision upon it. It is not about the merits of the social chapter, or the protocol on social policy, but about the right of the House to give its judgment upon it. It is not about the merits of the Bill itself, or of the Maastricht treaty, but about whether the House should be able to amend it in one important respect.

I do not intend to dwell in great detail on the issue, apart from saying that the social chapter is a very important part of the agreement that was reached by the other 11 member states. It is an issue to which the Government, as my motion makes clear, are opposed. They wish to be at the heart of everything in Europe, except social policy.

According to article 1 of the social protocol agreement of the treaty on European union,

"The Community and the Member States shall have as their objectives the promotion of employment, improved living and working conditions, proper social protection, dialogue between management and labour, the development of human resources with a view to lasting high unemployment and the combatting of exclusion. To this end the Community and the Member States shall implement measures which take account of diverse forms of national practices, in particular in the field of contractual relations, and the need to maintain the competitiveness of the Community economies."

The social chapter—I list the headings only—deals with the improvement of the working environment to protect workers' health and safety; working conditions; the information and consultation of workers; equality between men and women with regard to labour market opportunities so as to ensure that each member state shall maintain the principle of equal pay for male and female workers; social security and social protection of workers; protection of workers where their employment contract is terminated; representation and collective defence of the interests of workers and employers; conditions of employment, and so on.

It is a very important protocol. The Government are determined to prevent it from applying to this country. I do not comment upon its merits, but it is an issue so important to the Government that they persuaded the other 11 member states to let them off having to apply it. That is the Government's position. The Opposition's position, by contrast, is that my right hon. Friends attach great importance to the social chapter. I do not even comment at this point on whether they are right or wrong, but there can be no dispute that that is what the party of which I am a member wants.

When the Chairman of Ways and Means called a group of amendments which was headed by amendment No. 7 and which contained amendment No. 27, he knew perfectly well that that was the occasion on which these great issues would be debated. On 20 January, my right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) said:

"Amendment No. 7 is a probing amendment which we intend ultimately to withdraw . . . I shall address my remarks to amendment No. 27 on which, in due course, we shall press the Committee to a vote."

He then read out amendment No. 27, which would, of course, change the relationship.

We now come to the nub of the matter, because we are talking about an important parliamentary difference of opinion which is not able to be resolved by voting on amendment No. 27. My right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland also said:

"The Bill excludes Britain from provisions which our 11 partners have agreed to facilitate greater protection for employed people in their working conditions, better rights of consultation and information, equality of treatment and opportunity for men and women, and the integration into the labour force of long-term unemployed people, including disabled workers."

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the right hon. Member for Watford (Mr. Garel-Jones), then made an important statement. He said:

"The hon. Gentleman will be aware that, under the terms of the amendment, United Kingdom law would not conform to the treaty's provisions, so it would be impossible for the United Kingdom to ratify that treaty".

My right hon. Friend responded at once, as I would have expected. He said:

"I . . . willingly explain . . . As the right hon. Gentleman well knows, I would not move the amendment on behalf of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) and my other hon. Friends if we did not fully understand its implications. Those implications would be to remove the protocol on social policy, which refers to the exclusion of the social chapter from the treaty. That would require Her Majesty's Government to negotiate with the other 11 Community members . . . Of course, I recognise that that would present Her Majesty's Government with a dilemma, but we have taken the precaution to check that the other 11 member states would be happy for that outcome to obtain." —[Official Report, 20 January 1993; Vol. 217, c. 402-03.]

One cannot imagine a more fundamental question.

We now come to the Chairman's latest ruling. On Thursday last week, he said:

"to be selectable for a separate Division the purport of an amendment needs to have been substantially covered during the course of the debate on the group in which it has been included."—[Official Report, 15 April 1993; Vol. 222, c. 961.]

Amendment No. 27 was the main debate, and no one can honestly believe that amendment No. 27 passed almost unnoticed in a clutch of amendments about the social chapter.

[Mr. Benn]

My right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland, ever quick to point to the importance of what had been announced by the Chairman, replied using stronger language than I would use. He said:

"Many people far beyond the confines of the Chamber will feel that the House of Commons has been cheated of a legitimate reason to have a vote. I do not use that word lightly, but because I am singularly unconvinced—I believe that the majority of the House is unconvinced—about the reasons for your decision."—[Official Report, 15 April 1993; Vol. 222, c. 963.]

This is a major issue, a major ruling which prevents a vote, and a clear statement by my right hon. Friend that it is his view and that of others that the House has been cheated.

On Monday, again offering to be helpful—he has genuinely aimed to be helpful throughout—the Chairman made a further statement. I shall not say "reasons" because Chairmen do not give reasons. He said—this is the nub of the motion:

"the Chair must have regard to a number of factors, including the Committee's debates, the clarity of effect of an amendment, and its impact on the Bill which, if brought into effect, must be both workable and understandable."—[Official Report, 19 April 1993; Vol. 223, c. 39.]

If we do not challenge that ruling, the terms "workable" and "understandable"—as I hope to show—will remain in the rules of the House for all time and all Bills. How can I tell the electorate in Chesterfield and people who want the Bill but with the social chapter that they cannot vote on it because the Chairman of Ways and Means says that an amendment that would bring Britain into line with every other country is not workable or understandable? It is the most workable and most understandable amendment that one could find; it is the one that 11 other countries in the Community have accepted. That is the difficulty.

Mr. Ray Whitney (Wycombe): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Benn: If the hon. Gentleman insists, but I do not want to detain the House for too long.

Mr. Whitney: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. He is making great play of the importance of adhesion to the social chapter. Why does the fact that the House will have a chance to vote on the social chapter on new clause 74 not satisfy his keen interest in the subject?

Mr. Benn: I am trying to avoid dwelling on the merits of the argument in order to concentrate on the parliamentary aspects of the matter. What should happen when the leader of a major Opposition party puts his name at the head of an amendment which is accepted by the Chair, and the party spokesman begins by saying that he will concentrate solely on that amendment? There are masses of ways of dealing with every issue, but that was the one chosen by the Opposition party.

Before I deal with the long-term implications, I shall consider briefly the arguments against voting. One, which has been repeated by the right hon. Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King), is that the motion would somehow require the Chairman to resign, because it would impugn his impartiality. The argument has nothing to do with that. It is about three words that the Chairman used—"workable and understandable".

It is also said that a vote would not work because part of the Bill has already been passed. That is the point raised by my right hon. Friend the deputy leader of the Labour party last night. But if the motion is read carefully, it will be seen that it asks "the Chairman . . . to reconsider . . . forthwith".

It would be perfectly easy to find a procedural motion to put the matter back in its proper place in the Bill. I am afraid that, if the House votes against our motion, that will make it harder for Madam Speaker to select the same issue on Report. The argument would be put to her that the House had had a chance to reconsider and had rejected it.

Now I come to the wider questions which ought to concern people, and which go well beyond their interest in the Maastricht Bill. The real issue is that, if we leave the ruling in the record, the Chairman will have to consider every amendment to every Bill to decide whether it was "workable and understandable".

With the best will in the world, how does a Chairman know what is workable and understandable, unless he asks the Minister? He will say, "I have an amendment here, Secretary of State. Is it workable?" The Secretary of State will say, "I shall ask my civil servants," or he may say, "I shall ask the Law Officers—and I shall tell you whichever of the two judgments they give me suits me best." The Chairman of Ways and Means cannot decide whether an amendment is workable and understandable, so the ruling puts him at the mercy of the Executive—but the Chairman is our man, not the servant of the Government. That is the issue.

I might add that, if the Speaker of the House of Commons would not accept Bills that were not workable and understandable, a lot of legislation would not have gone through the House at all, including the poll tax legislation and some legislation on pay and other matters introduced by my right hon. Friends—but I shall not go into that now.

The Clerks are like elephants; they never forget. They have already noted the Chairman's ruling. I dug out my "Erskine May"—I have had a copy ever since I was first elected—and page 187 of the current edition says:

"The Chairman of Ways and Means or a Deputy Chairman has final authority over all points of order arising when he is in the chair and there is no appeal from his ruling to the Speaker."

The Clerk of the House will add a bit to that, in the next edition, which will say, "The Chairman will not allow a vote on any amendment that is not 'workable and understandable'." I do not want to see that written into the rules of the House, because it will affect the Liberal party. After all, most of the Liberals' proposals are neither understandable nor workable, so I confidently expect to have them with me in the Lobby.

It is the minority Members who are affected. After all, it is an official Opposition amendment that has been rejected. What about little parties, tiny parties and minuscule parties? What about Back Benchers? What chance have they of persuading the Chairman, under the influence of the Secretary of State and the Attorney-General, that their little amendment is workable and understandable?

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Benn: Yes, of course I shall, especially in the light of the hon. Gentleman's intervention yesterday.

Mr. Kirkwood: If the right hon. Gentleman is successful in browbeating the Chairman of Ways and Means into doing what he thinks is not right, does he believe that using majority power in the House to affect the decision of the Chair is in the interest of minority parties?

Mr. Benn: If I ever had the power to browbeat the Chairman or anyone else, I might have been tempted to do that. I am inviting the House to do what it does every day —to reach a judgment on whether it agrees with a proposal that is before it. I do not know what ideas the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) has about how Parliament should be resolved. However, if he does not want majorities to decide, the place should be packed up and given over—[Interruption.] Elections determine the majority and minority parties.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): This is a serious point, and I know that the right hon. Gentleman will treat it as such. If it is the right hon. Gentleman's case that majorities should always decide what amendments are selected, in normal circumstances that means that the Government will decide every amendment that comes before the House.

Mr. Benn: The hon. Gentleman is assuming that the Chairman is not independent. The purpose in my proposal is to keep him independent. The House cannot close a debate without a vote, but it is prepared to give the Chairman the right to deny a vote without support. That is the point and the issue.

I know that the atmosphere is highly charged, that the media claim that we are Euro-sceptics and that my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) has suddenly become a Euro-sceptic because he believes that this is an important parliamentary point. It is an important parliamentary point. In my opinion, it will damage the understanding of our proceedings among the people we represent. With the best will in the world—I have touched on it already—I cannot explain to people outside who want the social chapter to apply in Britain why one Member of the House, the Chairman, can say that it was not workable or understandable.

I am an old parliamentarian. I once moved a motion of this character because the Speaker refused me an emergency debate when military action was contemplated in Oman. I know that, for many hon. Members, procedure is dull and irrelevant. However, I believe that democracy is about procedure. It is not about what we decide, but about how we decide it. That is what the whole democratic argument is about.

Perhaps I am a sentimentalist, but I deeply believe that we have one responsibility above all others, and that is to pass on to those who come after us a decent democratic machinery which can be used by them as we have used it. That democratic machinery allows us to table amendments and have them considered, voted upon and so on.

I finish as I did 35 years ago, when I moved a similar motion against Mr. Speaker Morrison. When all the speeches are forgotten, when the election manifestos are in the British Library, when the Queen's Speeches have disappeared and the Bills have been repealed, "Erskine May" is what this place is about, because it gives us the machinery to decide what we were elected to do. If that is denied by an error of judgment—no more than that—by a Chairman, I think that we shall pay a heavy price for it in future.

4.7 pm

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Tony Newton): I hope it will be thought right, Madam Speaker, that I should rise at once to follow the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) and to set out some of the considerations which I believe the House should have in mind in judging what he has said and the motion he has brought before the House.

I do not think that I need to make a long speech, because it seems to me that the central issue is simple and clear: it is the issue of the authority of the Chair, and therefore its capacity to discharge effectively, on behalf of the House as a whole—not least the minority parties—the difficult task which the House as a whole has laid on it.

I note, of course, that the right hon. Gentleman has sought to resist that suggestion, but I must say frankly that I do not think he has done so successfully. Nor do I think he can, because in signalling the appearance of this motion, he could not have made his intention clearer, when he asked the Chairman:

> "If a motion of this kind is tabled, may I take it that you would not feel able to take the Chair of the Committee until the matter was resolved?"—[Official Report, 19 April 1993; Vol. 223, c. 41.]

Against that background, no amount of disclaimer, in whatever measured language, can alter the basic fact that the effect, and the intended effect, of this motion is to render it impossible for the Chairman to perform the duties that the House has laid on him unless and until it is defeated or withdrawn. As I said, that is the central issue which the House must resolve—whether it is to sustain the authority of the Chair to do its job.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): I am surprised by the line that the right hon. Gentleman is taking. My right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) used words which are his. Is the Leader of the House saying that, on that Monday when we pursued points of order and had a debate, there was no difference whatever in the accession of the Chair to what we were putting to him or his attitude to us? I put it to the right hon. Gentleman—he was not here, as many hon. Members were not here—that that was no different, because we respect the authority of the Chair in general. It is a matter of judgment on a single issue.

Mr. Newton: I do not accept that for a moment. Although I was not present throughout, I have carefully studied the lengthy points of order that were raised not only on Monday but on other occasions. If I may say so, the Chairman has listened and responded to those points of order with great care and courtesy.

There is the world of difference between legitimately putting points of order to the Chairman, albeit over a long period, and tabling a motion of this sort, which is, as the right hon. Member for Chesterfield made absolutely clear in his remarks on Monday, intended to make it impossible for the Chairman to function as the Chairman unless it has been disposed of.

Before I return to that matter, I should say something about the motion. I realise that, in many ways, it is not the central issue. Apart from anything else, it seems to reflect some misapprehension about the procedures of the House with respect to the selection of amendments. I think that this will be common ground.

Standing Order No. 31 is clear: in the Committee of the whole House, the Chairman is given the power—the right hon. Gentleman fairly said that it is an entirely unfettered power—to select the amendments, new clauses or new schedules to be proposed. That is understood. However, it seemed to render fairly meaningless the right hon. Gentleman's efforts to present his motion as some form of appeal or exercise of appeal rights. If he wishes to institute a right of appeal he should seek to change the Standing Order rather than table motions that criticise the Chair.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Can my right hon. Friend tell me where Standing Order No. 31 gives the right certainly with respect to the selection of amendments and with it the right to choose whether a Division will take place? On page 405 of "Erskine May" and the sub-notes, can he tell me where the practice which has grown up is set out as to the question whether a specific matter should be subjected to a Division? If he would be good enough to do that, I would be interested to hear his comments.

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend is accepting what I said about Standing Order No. 31, which I shall read to him if he wishes. Sub-section (2) of that Standing Order is absolutely clear:

"In committee of the whole House, the Chairman of Ways and Means and either Deputy Chairman shall have the like power"— to the Speaker in other circumstances—

"to select the amendments, new clauses or new schedules to be proposed".

The right hon. Member for Chesterfield also quoted from page 405 of "Erskine May":

"It is a common practice to allow several amendments to be discussed together, although they have not all been selected to be moved. The Speaker or chairman may at his discretion call for division one or more of those amendments selected for debate with another or other amendments, if requested to do so."

The key words are "at his discretion".

Mr. Roger Knapman (Stroud): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Newton: No, I will not give way for the moment.

What seems less clear to some, to judge both from the terms of the motion and some of the points of order made recently, is that the power of selection is separate from what the Chairman does when he groups amendments for debate. When he groups amendments, he calls the lead amendment—that is, he selects it under the provisions of Standing Order No. 31—and tells the Committee that, for the convenience of debate, he will allow the discussion of other amendments appearing later on the Order Paper.

Thus, when the right hon. Gentleman said that the Chairman of Ways and Means had selected amendment No. 27, that was not strictly the case. As I have just said, the occupant of the Chair selects an amendment when he calls an hon. Member to move it so that the House or Committee can take a decision on it. Amendment No. 27 has not been moved: it was grouped for debate with another amendment on which the Committee has voted.

Nor is it correct to say, as the motion does, that it was contrary to the normal practice not to allow a Division to take place on an amendment which has been debated. Many amendments are grouped for debate with selected amendments; whether they are subsequently selected for a separate Division is a matter for the discretion of the Chair, as is clear from the extract that I have just quoted from "Erskine May". There is nothing automatic about it.

So when the right hon. Member for Chesterfield claims that the Chair's ruling has some great long-term significance for parliamentary debates on all future legislation, his argument simply does not stand up. The exercise of the Chairman's discretion in respect of amendment No. 27 has been entirely in accordance with the practice of the House, and his ruling has no long-term significance of the nature that the right hon. Gentleman suggests.

Mr. Benn: If what the Leader of the House says is to be accepted, the Chairman could have given a simple answer. He could have said, "I will not allow a vote on the amendment. I did not select it." But he did not say that. He said that the amendment was not understandable or workable. That is the difficulty, because "Erskine May" makes it clear that the Speaker or Chairman does not give reasons. I can understand the reason why they do not give reasons. The reasons given in this case were wholly different from the ones which the Leader of the House has cooked up to resist the motion.

Mr. Newton: These are not arguments that I have cooked up, but ones on which I have taken careful advice. They represent a straightforward description, as I understand it and as I am advised, of the procedural position in respect of the amendment.

I should make just one other point about the motion. It is the one brought out by the right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett), the deputy Leader of the Opposition, in her intervention during my business statement yesterday, and acknowledged by the right hon. Member for Chesterfield today. It is the simple fact that, because the Committee has finished with the clauses of the Bill and is dealing with the new clauses, it is not possible for the Chairman to do as the motion asks. Indeed, amendment No. 27 has disappeared from the amendment paper.

The whole House knows that it is not the technicalities that are at issue here: it is the fundamental purpose and effect of the motion to which I referred earlier. The House has placed on the Chairman difficult and demanding responsibilities, within terms of reference which the House itself has determined. It has asked him to undertake those responsibilities during proceedings as difficult as any a Chairman has had to face for a long time.

For my part, I will say simply that, on all I have heard, seen and read in Hansard of those proceedings, he has exercised his responsibilities, whether in selecting and grouping amendments, listening and responding to many representations and innumerable points of order, or simply presiding over debate, with great care, great diligence and courtesy.

It is not a question whether any or all of us have liked each and every decision. The Chairman's is in some ways a role which produces a variant of one of the oldest political adages: it is a job in which you cannot please anyone all the time. There have been decisions unpalatable to those who want the social chapter and decisions unpalatable to those who do not. There have been decisions unpalatable to those who strongly support the Bill——

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Will the Leader of the House give way?

Mr. Newton: No, I will not give way for the moment —and decisions unpalatable to those who vigorously oppose it. That is the nature of the job. As the Chairman himself put it in responding to a point of order on Monday:

"I must and do take every factor into consideration, but at the end of the day the buck stops here: I have to choose the amendments."—[Official Report, 19 April 1993; Vol. 223, c. 44.]

The point could not have been put better than it was by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King) yesterday. He said that the motion sought to establish a dangerous precedent for the House, would have serious implications for the Chair, and is highly unfair to the Chairman of Ways and Means, who has conducted himself with good humour and tolerance.

The question for the House is whether it will reject the challenge which the right hon. Member for Chesterfield has mounted to the support which the Chairman is entitled to expect, both when we like his decisions and when we do not. If the motion is not withdrawn, as it should be, I urge the House to reject it, and reject it decisively.

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): All of us in the House are conscious of the importance of the relationship, balanced as it is between conflict and confidence, that exists between the House and the Chair. As the Leader of the House has just acknowledged, there cannot be an hon. Member here who has not, from time to time, disagreed with a decision of the Chair, even if it is only that the hon. Member believes that the occupant of the Chair has failed to recognise that the debate in hand would be immeasurably enriched by his or her contribution. Equally, every Member recognises the good faith and integrity that the occupants of the Chair bring to their onerous and difficult duties, and the extent to which those duties place them at the centre of the storm when difficult and contentious decisions arise. One such decision and one such ruling is cited in the motion that we are debating.

The whole House and many in the country are well aware that the announcement that there would not be an opportunity for the Committee to vote on amendment No. 27 on the social chapter has caused widespread concern on both sides. That concern was fully expressed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham), the shadow Foreign Secretary, when the ruling was first given on 30 March. You, Madam Speaker, and the House will recall that further concern was expressed at length in our debates on 15 April and that my right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland moved on that day to report progress on the Bill so that a sustained debate could be held in which our grave concern could be—and was—fully expressed.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland made it clear then, and we have repeatedly sought to make it clear since, that we are still seeking and will continue to seek an opportunity to vote on amendment No. 27 before the Bill completes all the stages of its passage through the House. We look for the opportunity for that vote on the Report stage of the Bill, on which decisions have yet to be made.

With all respect to the care and devotion shown by the Chairman of Ways and Means in his conduct of the Committee stage, which we do not criticise—I was pleased by the remarks of my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) when he moved the motion—we do not accept that amendment No. 27 and new clauses 74 or 75 are alternatives. My right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland explicitly made that case, as can be seen in Hansard. He said:

"I do not regard new clause 74"—

or 75—

"as an alternative to amendment No. 27, nor do I believe that it can be reasonably or realistically posed in those terms."—[Official Report, 19 April 1993; Vol. 223, c. 39.]

Sir David Steel: Will the right hon. Lady clear up one point? When he moved the motion, the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) did not refer to the narrative of how new clauses 74 and 75 appeared on the amendment paper. If the Opposition were so confident of amendment No. 27, why did they table the two new clauses?

Mrs. Beckett: If the right hon. Gentleman had been attending the debates, I am sure that he would know the answer to that question, which is that we regard the subjects covered in the amendment and the new clauses as entirely separate issues. I shall return to that issue later. We believe that the new clauses and the amendment are complementary.

Concern has been expressed that a precedent might be set by the handling of amendment No. 27. My right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield referred a number of times to the use of the words "workable and acceptable". We can all understand that there might be concern about the juxtaposition of a vote on amendment No. 27 and new clause 75. I am not suggesting that that was the reason for the ruling given by the Chairman of Ways and Means, because, as we all know, for reasons that we all understand, the Chair does not give reasons for his or her decisions.

However, the argument might have been considered whereby it was thought that if amendment No. 27 were carried—removing the social protocol—it might remove the occasion for a vote on new clause 75. I can well understand that concern. However, we remain of the view that it would have been quite practical and possible for amendment No. 27 and new clause 75 to be debated separately, and that the one did not require a different decision from the other.

Mr. Dalyell: My right hon. Friend rightly said that the Chair does not normally give reasons, but part of the trouble is that the Chairman of Ways and Means, wisely or not, appeared on the Scottish television programme, "Scottish Lobby" on 18 April and gave his reasons. I quote from his script:

"And just on balance, because it was slightly more workable, I chose to have the debate on new clause 75."

This may be part of the hazard of the Chairman going on television, but a reason was given.

Mrs. Beckett: I would not criticise the Chairman of Ways and Means for his remarks which were no doubt intended to elucidate for the viewer what on earth it is we are going on about here. I well understand his difficulty in doing so without straying into the territory that my hon. Friend has quoted. However, it would not be right for us to suggest, and I am sure that my hon. Friend did not mean to do so, that the Chairman had strayed into giving reasons, as that would be a precedent and we all recognise that such a precedent should be avoided.

The Leader of the House said that the motion was not about the technicalities of the issue. I take his point, but he went on to defend at length the judgment that has been made on the vote on amendment No. 27. I must therefore say to him and to the House that, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland made crystal clear from the Front Bench on behalf of the official Opposition on 19 April, we have not accepted that an amendment that is in order, has been debated and has the official backing of the Opposition—it is tabled in the name of the Leader of the Opposition—should not be available for decision in the Committee. We do not accept that such a precedent has been set.

We had every reason to expect that there would be a Division. The Chairman of Ways and Means said in Committee:

"We are some way off a vote on amendment No. 27."—[Official Report, 22 February 1993; Vol. 219, c. 685.]

That carries the connotation that there would be a Division and at that stage no one expected that there would not be a Division on amendment No. 27. He then suggested on television on 18 April that a Division on the amendment might have been expected at one stage. That is the real significance that we attach to the Chairman's remark. It immeasurably strengthens the case for a vote on amendment No. 27 on Report, which is perhaps a way of tidying up this extremely difficult matter.

As was identified yesterday and reiterated by the Leader of the House today, we cannot now proceed, whether or not it is desirable, in the manner proposed by the motion tabled by my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield. "Erskine May" makes it absolutely plain on page 496 that once the Chairman has put the Question that the clause stand part of the Bill—and the Question was put on Monday—

"No other amendment can be proposed to a clause after this question has been proposed from the Chair."

My right hon. Friend suggested that some procedural method might be found, but he also suggested that we should take "Erskine May" as our bible and "Erskine May" leaves us in no doubt on the matter. That means that the question of an understanding approach to the desire of a majority in the House to decide on amendment No. 27 on Report—we know that there is a majority in the House, because otherwise we would not be having all this difficulty today—must inform our debate and decision.

That brings me to my final point which I hope will be borne in mind, especially by Conservative Members. The hon. Member for Worcestershire, South (Mr. Spicer) and the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Sir D. Steel) sought to place the blame for these difficulties at the door of Her Majesty's loyal Opposition. I thought that the hon. Gentleman had incredible nerve. The scale of the difficulties faced by the Chairman of Ways and Means is the Government's creation.

It was the Government who claimed that amendment No.27 would wreck the Bill and the treaty. It was they who then claimed that, on the contrary, it would make no difference. It was they who brought in the Attorney-General, who failed to answer fully half the questions put to him by my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson), to tell us that this was all of no significance. It was the Government, in the shape of the right hon. Member for Watford (Mr. Garel-Jones), who went about their usual business of placing ideas in the minds of the Lobby and everyone else to the effect that the Opposition must find another way of raising these issues. And then the Government have the nerve to come to the House and ask why we sought to find other ways to raise them.

Sir David Steel: Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Beckett: I have already given way to the right hon. Gentleman once and I have answered his point. I am almost at the end of my remarks and I do not want to take up too much time. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman will catch your eye, Madam Speaker, and be able to make his own speech.

It is the Government, too, who, since the other new clauses have been tabled, have not only continued to cast doubt on the validity of a vote on amendment No. 27 but have claimed that every other amendment or new clause tabled by the Opposition is in some way ineffective. I am certain that it is not the desire of the Chair, but it is most certainly the desire of the Government, to prevent the House from reaching a decision on the social chapter or, if they cannot prevent it, to find a way of discounting or ignoring it. Their manoeuvrings are the direct cause of the difficulties that have understandably been experienced by the Chairman of Ways and Means.

For that reason, because we cannot do what the motion suggests, because the opportunity to vote on amendment No. 27 is not yet completely lost to us, and because of the remarks of my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield about the respect in which the Chairman of Ways and Means is held in every part of the House, I very much hope that my right hon. Friend will follow the usual precedent once concerns of this nature have been aired in debate in the Chamber. I must tell the right hon. Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King) that these concerns have been aired on a number of occasions before—by the official Opposition when the Conservative party was the Opposition, by ourselves, and by Back Bench Members on both sides of the House. The phenomenon is not unknown, but usually when such concerns have been aired and such a debate has been held, the motion is either withdrawn or negated by voice only and not pressed to a Division.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield told the House that the only way to bring the matter before the House and to express concern was to table the motion. That is his view; it may or may not be the view of all Members. Unquestionably, however, he is not required to press the motion to a Division because he has brought it before the House, and I hope that he will not do so. If he chooses to do so, I must tell him that I will advise my right hon. and hon. Friends to vote against it.

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. May I ask you to rule on a matter? I regret having to do so, but you are the only person in a position to make such a ruling.

All three speakers so far have referred to a Report stage for the Bill. I want you to rule on whether the Report stage of a Bill that has been considered in a Committee of the whole House is different from the Report stage of a Bill considered in a normal Standing Committee. In past years,

I have moved more amendments in Committee that have been found to be defective than I have had hot dinners, but subsequently I have been able to find opportunities on Report to raise exactly the same issues.

For the avoidance of doubt, can you tell us whether the procedures are any different? Does the content of amendment No. 27—whether the wording is the same does not matter—mean that we are precluded from considering such an amendment on Report? It could only be selected by you, Madam Speaker, so it is only you who can give the ruling. Does the fact that the Bill has been considered on the Floor of the House prevent the House from coming to a conclusion on the precise contents of amendment No. 27?

Madam Speaker: The whole situation and the matter raised by the hon. Gentleman are very hypothetical. In order not to leave the House in any doubt, I will make no ruling whatever. I will determine it when these matters are put before me at the appropriate time.

4.34 pm

Mr. Roger Knapman (Stroud): I listened with care to the right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett). If I heard her correctly, she said that she was actively looking for other ways of dealing with the matter than amendment No. 27. I suspect some of us can understand why.

My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House quoted extensively from pages 404 and 405 of the procedural book, "Erskine May". Unfortunately, he finished at the end of the second paragraph on page 405, whereas to me the most important point is at the beginning of the third paragraph:

"Selection is made by the Chair in such a way as to bring out the salient points of criticism".

Therein for me lies the difficulty.

May I draw the attention of the House to the European Communities (Amendment) Bill, hardly as long as the 63,500 words of the treaty, and to something which does not normally get much attention, the explanatory memorandum which says:

"The Bill will have no direct financial effect in the United Kingdom."

I invite the House to reflect on whether that is so. I suspect that it is not true and never has been. Only amendment No. 27 bears on the matter.

My constituents in Stroud will be obliged, through VAT, to pay moneys to the advantage of countries which are presumed to have the benefit of the social chapter. In short, my constituents in Stroud will, through VAT, push money across to Sicily, Sardinia or other areas which are regarded as suffering poverty.

Many people say that there is an opt-out from the social chapter. What we mean is that we are giving the other 11 nations the opportunity to have a social chapter because they believe that it is in their interests. Perhaps the two great lies in the debate are, first, that opt-outs mean very much and, secondly, that if we do not have Maastricht we will not get inward investment. Perhaps the opt-out will be effective but by the time we have seen article 100A, on majority voting, and by the time that we have looked at health and safety legislation, and, most of all, the European Court of Justice, our opt-out may not be as effective as many think. Only amendment No. 27 addresses those points. If it is not called, we will get no opportunity to make our view known on behalf of our constituents.

Mr. Rupert Allason (Torbay): I am sympathetic to many of the views which my hon. Friend has expressed in the House in recent weeks. Can he explain why the issue cannot be raised on Report?

Mr. Knapman: May I draw the attention of my hon. Friend to the fact that there is a movement towards new clauses 74 and 75? No doubt we shall be asked to look at new clauses which have not yet even been framed. The debate will be at a later stage. Therefore, there is little chance of amendment No. 27 being called by Madam Speaker at the appropriate time; of course, Madam Speaker, that will be a matter for you.

New clause 74 says:

"This Act shall come into force only when the House of Commons has come to a Resolution on a motion tabled by a Minister of the Crown".

At this stage we have no idea what that motion might say.

The motion is not to me a form of challenge to authority. I speak as one who has been here for the 21 days of Committee proceedings. It is encouraging that the longer we carry on debating the Maastricht treaty, the more hon. Members are here.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): New clause 74 says that the powers of the legislation shall not take effect until there has been a debate on the social chapter. If the new clause is accepted in Committee, does not that make it difficult for the Chair to accept amendment No. 27 on Report? Is not that the problem?

Mr. Knapman: My hon. Friend is exactly right. That must be so, and it was among the points that I was trying to make.

I promised in my note to you this morning, Madam Speaker, that I would not detain the House for more than one or two minutes. You will know that the whole House holds you in the greatest respect because we know that you are the guardian of Back Benchers' interests. My constituents are being asked, probably for the first time, to have their taxes sent abroad—I still feel that Sicily and Sardinia are abroad—at the very time when our county council is short of money for education. The matter is important and I want an opportunity to vote on it. Unless my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House can contradict me, I say that amendment No. 27 is the only one that deals with that matter.

4.40 pm

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): I shall begin with five short general observations which will enable my subsequent specific comments to be even briefer. The way in which the House deals with treaties may certainly be defective. The right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) often draws attention to that in his not infrequent comments and criticisms of the Crown prerogative. However, that is not one of the responsibilities of the Chairman of Ways and Means, who must handle debates according to the rules as they are. Neither do I understand it to be an objective of the Labour party to change those rules, although since that party is in an evolutionary phase my information on that may be dated.

Yesterday and today the right hon. Member for Chesterfield compared his motion with that moved by the late Sir Elwyn Jones in 1972 and said that it was,

"supported by all Opposition Members."—[Official Report, 20 April 1993; Vol. 223, c. 184.]

[Sir Russell Johnston]

The right hon. Gentleman's memory is faulty. If he consults the Division lists for 1 and 6 March 1972 he will find my name and those of my right hon. and hon. Friends in the Liberal party. We voted against such motions and my right hon. Friend the Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Sir D. Steel), who was then the Whip of the Liberal party, spoke against it at that time. At that time his constituency was Roxburgh, Selkirk and Peebles.

Thirdly, the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) said that the Chairman of Ways and Means gave an interview on 18 April on the "Scottish Lobby" programme. However, I think that the interview was on 3 April. I have a transcript, which seems bland and inoffensive. He gave that interview with the best of intentions. However, I think that, while it is accepted on all sides that a Chairman or, indeed, you, Madam Speaker, should not have to give reasons for decisions because of the inevitable disputation that will follow, television, radio and press in-depth probing interviews should not be taken up but left to other hon. Members who are not subject to such inhibitions.

A long time ago the late Horace King "ignited" the Blackpool illuminations. I did not greatly approve of that and interviews have potentially a much greater detonatory effect. Fourthly, the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Knapman) gave an interview this morning. It is difficult for me to comment on it because I was in the land of nod when the interview took place and have had to depend on my more wide-awake colleagues to tell me about it. [Interruption.] Perhaps we could ignore the rumbustiousness of some Opposition Front-Bench Members. I am told that the hon. Gentleman said that the Chairman of Ways and Means was in cahoots with the Government on closure motions and that, in the tailoring phrase of the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), the whole thing was stitched up. My version of the interview may be slightly wrong and if so I will gladly withdraw.

One could say that I am in a uniquely appropriate position to comment since I have been in cahoots with the Government throughout debate on the Bill on timing and procedure and I know what it is all about. It is not true that the Chairman of Ways and Means is in cahoots with the Government. Throughout the progress of the Bill the timing of closures has been decided solely by the Chairman of Ways and Means according to his judgment of an appropriate time for debate. The Government have known no more about it than anyone else in the House. It is quite wrong for an hon. Member to make such allegations.

To my sure and certain knowledge, throughout our proceedings in Committee the Chairman has behaved with impeccable impartiality and has given no advance indication of his intentions to any Member that he was unwilling to give to another. I shall give that point the added stress that membership of a minority party allows me to give. We are extremely sensitive to any possibility of collusion between the Chairman and the Government and to the possibility of the Chairman being cavalier in the treatment of minority opinion. The Plant committee, which was established by the Labour party, has again drawn attention to the fact that if our support in the country was reflected in the House we would have more than 100 Members. In the light of that, I repeat that the Chairman of Ways and Means has behaved with impeccable impartiality.

Mr. Knapman: I draw the hon. Gentleman's attention to the comments by my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) which are contained in Monday's record of our proceedings. I can confirm those, as can my hon. Friend the Member for Beverley (Mr. Cran).

Sir Russell Johnston: That is a somewhat opaque comment. I regret that at my age instant recall is now denied to me.—[Laughter.]

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross): As one who suffers from a similar difficulty, may I tell the hon. Gentleman that all the allegations, which he has correctly denied, are entirely hearsay, would not be allowed in the High Court or the lower courts of Scotland, and should not be allowed in the High Court of Parliament. They are a great slight on the Chair.

Sir Russell Johnston: I note the hon. and learned Gentleman's remarks. I do not think that he and I have similar problems; we may have parallel problems.

It is certainly true that the whole Committee could have been handled in a different way. That would have made not only the job of the Chairman less stressful but would have enabled the Committee to have a more engaged, more real, debate.

I have been taking part in debates on the European Community for two decades. They have reached the stage of a sort of religious disputation in which nobody ever wins. Nevertheless, I have come to respect the consistent opposition of people such as the hon. Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) and the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore). His constituency is no longer called Stepney and Poplar. They are minorities, like me. They deserve to be heard and their arguments must be addressed.

Mr. Michael Lord (Suffolk, Central): Although his memory may not be what it was, I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is a fair man. Amendment No. 27 has been the most talked about amendment in the debate, and the amendment most discussed in the press and on television. It has been the amendment that Ministers have talked about, and debated on television. Being a fair man, does he not think that it is unreasonable that the House of Commons will not be allowed to vote on an amendment of such importance?

Sir Russell Johnston: I shall come to that point shortly.

I was talking about the handling of the Committee. Given its official support for Maastricht, the Labour party should have sat down with the Government and the minority parties and agreed a sensible timetable, and a limitation on speech length. I know that, in Committee, speech length is not normally limited, but it makes no sense for the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) to speak for hours. Apart from anything else, it does not progress the debate in any rational fashion. It was wrong that the Labour party felt unable to do so, mainly because of its Euro-sceptics. While both major parties frequently extol the virtues of the House as a unique example of democracy, they have been guilty of being unwilling to reform its procedures to make debate more of a meaningful discussion and less of a pyrotechnic confrontation.

Mr. George Robertson (Hamilton): This is not perhaps a terribly substantial point, but the hon. Gentleman spoke about the conduct of the Committee, through which I, like him, have sat virtually in its entirety. He made one of the first speeches, on one of the first amendments, and took an hour to do so. Is that the sort of limitation on speech length that he wants?

Sir Russell Johnston: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his not terribly substantial intervention on my not terribly substantial point. I remind him that on that occasion I gave way to 24 interventions—no wonder the speech took so long.

The motion is about the refusal of the Chairman of Ways and Means to allow a vote on amendment No. 27. My party argued for a vote on amendment No. 27 because we want the House to vote on whether the United Kingdom should accede to the social chapter of Maastricht. In practice, it has turned out to be difficult to find an appropriate form of words to ensure that. The Attorney-General told us that amendment No. 27 would not have such an effect. Indeed, he said that it would have no effect at all. Presumably, unless we have a vote of no confidence in the Attorney-General—as far as I know no one has suggested that—his decision has to be accepted.

Mr. Cash: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that those constitutional experts who are well acquainted with the constitutional usage and practice of the Law Officers of the Crown are deeply disturbed at the way in which the Attorney-General was brought into the argument? If anybody wishes to follow that up, he will find that there are substantial criticisms of the manner in which the Attorney-General was involved. No doubt, in due course, those will emerge.

Madam Speaker: Order. I remind the House that this is a limited motion. It deals only with the exercise of the Chair's discretion on amendment No. 27. I hope that the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston), who has the Floor of the House, and any others who are called to speak in the debate will limit their comments to the expressions in the motion before us.

Sir Russell Johnston: I am grateful for your guidance, Madam Speaker. I will leave what the hon. Member for Stafford has said, apart from saying that I have met few constitutional experts who do not spend most of the time being disturbed.

We are left with the judgment of the Attorney-General, so what does the Chairman of Ways and Means do then, poor thing? He is faced with that as a fact that he has to take into account. He knows that the House wants a vote on the social chapter, but his job is not to arrange that but to examine the amendments that are put before the Committee with that intention. What does he do when faced with an amendment that, according to the highest legal authority in the land, has no effect? His job is not to judge whether amendments will be carried but whether, if they are carried, they produce a clear result that can be implemented in law.

The right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) proclaimed at length the undesirability of being confined to what is workable and understandable. That is not an unreasonable confination, if there is such a word, and it would have been a happy thing if it had been applied to him over many years.

Mr. Benn: Without implying partiality by the Chairman—a point that neither the hon. Gentleman nor I have put forward—the hon. Gentleman said that the Chairman was guided by the law in deciding whether to allow a vote on amendment No. 27 because of the question of workability. Is that the road along which the House wishes to go, with the Chairman depending on the Law Officers—I made that point in my speech—to know whether he should call an amendment? That would be a dangerous course to follow.

Sir Russell Johnston: The right hon. Gentleman knows, probably better than me, that the Attorney-General is supposed to advise the House, not the Government. He is supposed to tell the House what, in his judgment, the law means. Therefore, I suppose that I would have to answer yes to the right hon. Gentleman.

None of us comes out of this covered with glory. Those of us who wanted a clear vote on the social chapter have failed to find a form of words to achieve that. The Liberal Democrats are also culpable in that, but the Labour party has far greater resources than we have, although both of us have equal access to the Clerks. Perhaps on Report we shall be successful. I hope so because I want such a vote.

We also have to recognise that, even if we achieve that elusive form of words on Report, such a vote would be carried only with the support of two groups. The first consists of Conservatives who are against Maastricht and the social chapter but who would vote against their views on the social chapter to achieve their objective of defeating Maastricht. The second consists of Labour Members who do not want Maastricht at all, even with the social chapter, and who will vote on the social chapter with the aim of defeating the whole book.

The justification for continuing through these byzantine tunnels and accepting some strange allies is the attempt to find some way to make the Government choose between having Maastricht with the social chapter or no Maastricht. I accept that that has been the object of my party and those on the Opposition Front Bench. None of that is either the fault or the responsibility of the Chair.

The right hon. Member for Chesterfield said that the House had been—"cheated" was the word that he used.

Mr. Benn: No. I was quoting my right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham).

Sir Russell Johnston: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman quoted with approbation. I do not see how he or anyone can say that and simultaneously claim that what he proposes casts no doubt on the Chairman's judgment.

Mr. Benn: I must correct the hon. Gentleman, because he misheard. I quoted my right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland but I said that that was stronger language than I would have used. I would not have used the word "cheat" in respect of a decision by the Chair. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will withdraw that allegation because it would be unfair to give a false impression.

Sir Russell Johnston: I am not going to argue that something is when it was not. However——

Mr. Dalyell: My right hon. Friend was very careful.

Sir Russell Johnston: It does not matter. At the end of the day, whatever the right hon. Member for Chesterfield says, the essence of the debate comes down to this: do we trust the judgment of the Chairman of Ways and Means or not? I trust it, and, if necessary, I shall vote that way in the Lobby tonight.

4.58 pm

Sir Peter Emery (Honiton): The debate is obviously not about Europe or about amendment No. 27, which is otiose because there is no way that it can be included in the Bill as it stands. Rather surprisingly, the debate is, in itself, one of the more important debates that have been held this Session, and the reason should be clear. We have no written constitution. The method and operation of Parliament are not because of a written constitution; in the place of a written constitution, we have precedents and procedure. It is the procedure of the House that governs the working of this place and ultimately safeguards the liberties of us all, both within the House and outside. That is why our procedures must be followed and must, in my judgment, be supported on all occasions.

I wish to make it absolutely clear that, in my view, the debate must end with an overwhelming vote of confidence in the Chairman of Ways and Means. There must be no escape, such as the withdrawal of the motion or a failure to appoint Tellers, which would prevent a vote taking place. We must not allow the matter to be left hanging around, suggesting an entirely unsatisfactory outcome to the debate. The reason for that is absolute. Indeed, it goes to the heart of our parliamentary system.

Parliament works not because it exists but because it is allowed to operate by the mutual consent of its Members, who over many years have established a procedure that allows individual Members, often of highly conflicting views, to be able to conduct debates and consider legislation in a way that enables Governments to govern and Opposition Members to debate fairly in expressing their points of view.

To that end, Madam Speaker, we elect you and senior Chairmen—they are similarly elected by the House—to rule over us and to ensure that debates and the general proceedings of the House are conducted in a proper and orderly manner, as established by the procedure that has been put in place.

Mr. Spearing: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman, who is the Chairman of the Procedure Committee, for allowing me to intervene. Will he concede, particularly as the motion before us is a rarity—I think that the previous debate on such a motion took place about 20 years ago—that the procedure of the House allows for the safety valve of a debate of this sort? Such debates provide guidance for Chairmen in future and are integral to the practice of the House. They are therefore permissible, whatever the merits or demerits of any such motion.

Sir Peter Emery: The hon. Gentleman is correct. The motion is in order. Indeed, we would not be debating it if it were not. However, when the authority of the Chair is questioned, as it is in the motion, we undermine the structure that I am determined to defend.

Those who claim that the motion is no criticism of my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, South (Mr. Morris), the Chairman of Ways and Means, do not live in the real world. It must be seen as an attack on the Chairman's impartiality and the integrity of the Chair. It is—[Interruption.] Those who say no should listen for a moment. If the motion were passed, the Chairman, being a man of honour, would have no alternative but to resign. That needs to be clearly understood.

Mr. Benn: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Peter Emery: No. Let the right hon. Gentleman sit for a moment.

As I have said, it must be clearly understood that the Chairman would have to resign. Whether the right hon. Gentleman likes it or not, that is the action that an honourable man would take.

Mr. Benn: The right hon. Gentleman is hyping up the issue beyond reason, and I shall tell the House why. There are many occasions when the House varies an earlier decision. That happens quite often. We are the High Court of Parliament, and in this instance we are reviewing the judgment of one of the Officers of the House. No judge resigns when his decision is overturned on appeal.

The right hon. Gentleman is trying to make it personal, which is the great corruption of modern politics. It seems that we cannot discuss principle without the discussion being turned into a punch-up with someone. That is something that will destroy democracy perhaps more readily than anything else.

Sir Peter Emery: The right hon. Gentleman may not understand what honour is all about. I believe beyond a shadow of a doubt that, if the motion were passed, we would put the Chairman in an untenable position. We have seen it happen once before, and that will be in the memory of some right hon. and hon. Members. The issue did not result in a motion, but the then Chairman of Ways and Means decided that he must resign.

Has the Chairman of Ways and Means erred? I suggest that his only error, being the extremely nice man he is, has been to try to explain things to his critics and to set out the reasons for his decisions to show his impartiality. Indeed, some of his decisions have certainly not pleased Her Majesty's Government.

Had the Chairman not been so reasonable—had he not tried to make others understand the reasons for his decisions—today's problems would probably not have arisen. The Chairman could have held to the time-honoured procedure that has been established over the years, which is that the Chair does not give reasons for the selection of amendments for debate or for Divisions. If anyone is in doubt about that, let him remember that reference has already been made to page 405 of "Erskine May".

Mr. Dalyell: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Peter Emery: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman when I have referred the House to an exactly similar matter that arose when Sir Charles MacAndrew was Chairman of Ways and Means. Mr. Eric Fletcher said that, if the then Chairman ruled that certain amendments could be discussed together, that could only be on the "assumption that they have all been selected for discussion." He added:

> "If you rule that certain Amendments can be discussed together . . . surely it follows that, if any Member wishes to vote on any Amendment that has been discussed, he is entitled to ask that there should be a Division."

The then Chairman replied:

"Certainly not. That has never been the rule. I have been doing this work for many years and this has always been the rule that I am now applying. It is often indicated, as the hon. and learned Gentleman has just done, that a Division is desired, and I am allowing a Division on two Amendments. Otherwise, all that would happen would be that my selection would be very much narrower."

Mr. Fletcher asked:

"The Chair has power of selection?", and the then Chairman replied yes. Later, Mr. Fletcher said:

"I suggest, in all seriousness, that once the Chair has ruled that certain Amendments have been selected for discussion, and might all be discussed together, the Chair has no authority to decide that there shall not be a Division on any of the selected Amendments."

The then Chairman replied:

"The Chair has every power to do so. Up to that point, there has only been one Amendment called. If the Chair does not call any of the others there can be no Divisions. It is very simple. Now we had better get on with the business."

Mr. Tom Proctor, whom some of us will remember, intervened as follows:

"Is it now contended that the Chair has two selections, selection for discussion and selection for voting? I have never heard of two before."

The then Chairman said:

"Well, the hon. Member has heard of them today."—[Official Report, 14 February 1957; Vol. 564, c. 1459-61.]

The same issue arises this afternoon.

Mr. Dalyell: I want to be clear on who the Chairman of the Procedure Committee was referring to in relation to the censure of a Chairman of Ways and Means. Was he referring to the MacAndrew incident or something else?

Sir Peter Emery: I said that there was not a censure motion. There was a debate concerning Sir Gordon Touche, who resigned.

Mr. Cash: Will my right hon. Friend give way on that point? Was there an amendment in the name of the Leader of the Opposition? It might be helpful to know that.

Sir Peter Emery: I do not think that that matters.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Is the answer to the question no?

Sir Peter Emery: I shall answer the question in my own way, if the hon. Gentleman will allow me to do so. He has enough to say in the House without making my speeches for me.

I say in response to my hon. Friend that selection rests entirely with the Chair. If that were not so, junior Members, or Members representing minority parties, would never get any consideration. It must be on the matter of the amendment itself. Page 490 of "Erskine May" states:

"The Chairman may at his discretion allow separate divisions on one or more of the subsequent amendments."

It seems to me that those who speak in favour of the motion are directly challenging the discretion and impartiality of the Chair. By questioning the discretion they are undermining that authority. The motion must be rejected. I again stress that the motion must be defeated by a massive vote so that it is clear beyond peradventure that we have absolute confidence in the Chairman of Ways and Means.

5.10 pm

Mr. Denzil Davies (Llanelli): As we have been reminded, the motion is about the decision of the Chairman of Ways and Means not to allow a vote on amendment No. 27. To some extent, the motion is a product of the difficulties that the Committee and the Chairman have faced, and the frustration that the Committee has felt because we are trying to debate a Bill which incorporates a treaty that will have an effect on much, if not most, of the commercial, financial and economic life of the nation.

The real legislation that we are debating is not the European Communities (Amendment) Bill, but the treaty of European union. We cannot amend it. We can exclude, but we cannot amend. The last time something similar happened was 21 years ago, and it happened then for the same reason. Sir Elwyn Jones moved a motion—I forget the words—regretting the lack of selection of amendments because we were in precisely the same situation then as now: the Bill that we were debating was not the real Bill. We were debating the treaty of Rome—that was the real Bill—and we could not amend it then. I am not sure that then we could even exclude parts of it. That Bill was slightly different from this one, but we were experiencing the same frustrations and problems.

Sir Elwyn's motion was not a personal criticism of the then Chairman of Ways and Means, just as the present motion is not a personal criticism of our Chairman.

The Standing Committees of the House are there to debate Bills. Bills are presented after they have been given a Second Reading, and Second Reading Bills are draft Bills. They are completed after consultation with Ministers —sometimes after White or Green Papers—but they are draft Bills. They then go before a Committee. The function of the House is to debate them, to try to change them and to make representations to Ministers. It is the opportunity that hon. Members have to change legislation.

Again, we cannot do that here. We are not debating a "Second Reading" Bill; we are debating, in effect, a "Third Reading" Bill. The treaty of European union is a Third Reading Bill which cannot be changed. That is one reason for the frustration, and one reason why we are here today in the same circumstances as 21 years ago.

The problem has been compounded—I make no criticism, although I will criticise on another occasion—by the fact that the official Opposition—except in regard to the social chapter—is in general agreement with Her Majesty's Government. The House works best when the official Opposition are opposing.

The Executive in Britain sits in the legislature, and I think that it is a good system. I do not go along with the trendy views of The Independent and The Guardian and the chattering classes that it is a terrible system. Because the Executive sits in the legislature, the Executive in the main has control over the legislature. It has enormous power, but that power is limited, checked and balanced by the fact that Her Majesty's loyal Opposition, in general, oppose. In this case, they do not, apart from on the social chapter, thus increasing the problem that the power of the Executive over this legislation is even greater than it normally is within our legislative and constitutional system. That also has contributed to our frustrations and, in the end, to this motion.

In addition to those difficulties, we have also had problems with the debates. The Chairman of Ways and

[Mr. Denzil Davies]

Means had no alternative but to make groupings of amendments. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) said, the Chairman of Ways and Means saw us in his room and we discussed these matters. Because we could only exclude chunks of the Bill, he had no option but to group a large number of amendments together.

I think that Ministers treated those debates as if they were Second Reading debates; certainly the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the right hon. Member for Watford (Mr. Garel-Jones), has done so. I will exonerate the Foreign Secretary and partly exonerate the Financial Secretary to the Treasury from this criticism, but in general Ministers have treated them as Second Reading debates. They have intervened early, not replied to the debates and often replied to only a few of the points raised. The cue was taken by my hon. Friends, quite naturally, because that is the way the system works.

As to the question of closures, many of us were cut off in full flight. My hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) was actually writing his speech on the Front Bench, but he did not have a chance to speak. I have spoken to people outside the House who watch our proceedings on satellite and cable television on something called the parliamentary channel. They have expressed amusement, and asked "Who is that gentleman who so often jumps up? He sits not far from where the Chairman of Ways and Means sits. Sometimes he is a little gentleman, sometimes a large gentleman, but when hon. Members speak he suddenly jumps up and that is the end of the debate." I have to try to explain that the gentleman is not a lord high executioner. I think the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Patnick) has done the same thing on one or two occasions.

Madam Speaker: May I jump up and intervene? I am being very tolerant, but the right hon. Gentleman has had a long introduction to what he is really seeking to say. He will understand that I have many hon. Members to call. I hope he will now speak more directly to the motion.

Mr. Davies: The way in which the closure was operated added to our frustration.

Amendment No. 27 is not only about the operation of the social chapter, but about money, because it deals with the part of the treaty relating to payments to be made by Her Majesty's Government towards the administration of the social chapter by the other 11 member states. So there are two factors involved which unite the different groups in the House who are against the Maastricht treaty.

The problem started, I am sorry to say, when the Chairman of Ways and Means appeared to most of us to have agreed that there would be a vote on amendment No. 27. It would be unfair to subject the Chairman's statement to a kind of Byzantine textual criticism, because, by definition, the Chairman's job is to react to certain situations and circumstances.

The Chairman of Ways and Means said:

"We are some way off a vote."

Later, he said:

"I am minded to take seriously the need for a further debate".

To the Chairman's credit, he accepted that further debate, and the Attorney-General had to come and speak to the Committee. Then he went on to say:

"before the Committee votes on that amendment."—[Official Report, 22 February 1993; Vol. 219, c. 685.]

In my opinion, that was a clear statement that there would be a vote on the amendment. It was not a decision; it was a statement at the time. The Chairman then changed his mind. He was entitled to change his mind and decide in the way that he did, but to give a strong indication to the Committee that he was prepared to call a vote and then to change his mind means that we are entitled to scrutinise and consider carefully whether there were any reasons for that change of mind, bearing in mind, as has been said, that the amendment had been selected for debate, was in order and was not a wrecking amendment. The Minister of State, the right hon. Member for Watford, thought that it was, but he was wrong. The Attorney-General made it clear that it was not a wrecking amendment. It was tabled not by the cavaliers on the Back Benches but by the roundheads on the Opposition Front Bench. It is a sensible and respectable amendment.

When it appeared to us, therefore, that the Chairman of Ways and Means had changed his mind, we were, and are, entitled to scrutinise why he did so. The Chairman of Ways and Means, being a very brave, nice and, perhaps, foolish man, did not give reasons, but he came close to giving reasons. No doubt that was a dangerous thing to do, because barrack-room lawyers on the Back Benches could then pore over the reasons, or non-reasons, that had been given.

Then the Chairman quite properly indicated—I applaud him for it, because he had changed his mind—at column 39 on 19 April that he had to consider, in allowing a vote, the clarity of the amendment, its impact on the Bill and the fact that, if brought into effect, it had to be workable and understandable. Without having subjected the amendment to that amount of textual criticism, I had always thought that amendment No. 27 was pretty clear. The Minister of State got it all wrong, but if he was wrong he was clearly wrong, as was said of a judge in the Court of Appeal some time ago.

The Attorney-General did not think much of amendment No. 27, for it did not make any difference to anybody, but it was perfectly clear to him. I have read again the Attorney-General's speech. Nowhere did he say that amendment No. 27 was not clear. The Foreign Secretary made a statement before the Attorney-General spoke. He did not say, either, that amendment No. 27 was not clear. With the greatest respect, therefore, there is nothing wrong, so far as I can see, with the clarity of amendment No. 27.

Is amendment No. 27 workable and understandable? The Government seemed to think that it was workable and understandable. Many of us have been Ministers and have latched on to little nods from parliamentary draftsmen and civil servants, indicating that we should resist certain amendments because they are badly drafted; unclear and unworkable. There was no such indication from the Government about amendment No. 27. The promoters of the Bill, the Foreign Secretary and the Attorney-General, never told us, as far as I can tell—I leave aside the Minister of State who says lots of things—that amendment No. 27 is unworkable, cannot be understood and will do something terrible to the Bill.

I cannot understand the reasons or the indications given by the Chairman of Ways and Means. They do not convince me. They may convince others. I make no criticism of the honesty or integrity of the Chairman of Ways and Means, but looking at it as a statement, that is my feeling about it.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield said, or implied, if every future vote has to be taken on an amendment that is workable and clear, there will be far fewer votes in Committees. There will also be far fewer votes on Government amendments. I remember Government amendments, inserted in Committee into groups of amendments and voted upon, that were not particularly clear or workable or understandable. There lies the rub. It is a very brave Chairman of any Committee who, on a Bill promoted by the Government, who have a panoply of assistance from parliamentary draftsmen and civil servants, says, "This amendment is not clear and is not workable; therefore I will not call it." That is why I am not convinced by the reasons or indications that have been given to us.

I hope, Madam Speaker, that it may be possible, somehow, to have a vote on amendment No. 27, or on one similar to it. Many people outside the House will find it strange if we are unable to do so. Therefore, I hope that a way of doing so can be found. After all, a vote takes only 15 minutes.

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): I am grateful to you, Madam Speaker, for calling me to speak in the debate. My intervention will be brief so that other hon. Members will have an opportunity to contribute to the debate.

I listened with increased misgivings to what was said about the motion. However much the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) tries to give the impression, as he does with great skill, that what he has put forward is reasonable, restrained and far from being a fully fledged censure motion, one listens to such points with mounting anxiety. As the Chairman of the Procedure Committee, my right hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery), rightly said, the implications of the motion are sinister for the future of the House and the conduct of its business. The implications of the motion are outrageous, even though it is cleverly couched in restrained and slightly reticent language.

I am old-fashioned enough to believe in the procedures of the House—so much so as to say that I do not believe that the reasons given by the Chair for selecting or not selecting amendments should be questioned in any way. That may sound excessively docile, but it is the only way in which the House can proceed in a practical way, particularly on major legislation that is taken on the Floor of the House, when there is a highly charged atmosphere and when people are looking for the slightest reason to be suspicious, with barrack-room lawyers looking not just for television interview reasons but for the slightest reason to suspect conspiracy or collusion between the Treasury Bench, the Chair, and so on.

I have detected no evidence of that in any way whatsoever throughout the 19 or 20 days of the prolonged Committee stage on the Floor of the House. One has to compare these proceedings with the much more fundamental and profound Bill on entry into the Community and the treaties—the treaty of Rome and treaty of accession—that we enacted in 1972 and 1973, when I think I am right in saying that fewer days were spent considering the measure in a Committee of the whole House. That was a much more epoch-making step for this country to take, at the request of the then Government, than this legislation, although I welcome it, and the treaty, for all the reasons that have been put forward in our debates.

There has been a huge amount of debate on the Bill by a minority of Members. I reckon that between 85 and 90 hon. Members in all parts of the House are rigorously against the provisions of the Bill, in its final enactment, and the treaty behind it. When one compares that with the overwhelming majority of hon. Members who want the Bill to be enacted and also want the treaty, the amount of time devoted to debate has been more than reasonable. It is outrageous to suggest that the Chair has given erroneous reasons, or has done the wrong thing by the House of Commons in respect of amendment No. 27, or has, in general, oppressed the House. But that is the meaning of the motion. That is why it is unacceptable and should be crushingly defeated today.

Mr. Knapman: I am sorry that my hon. Friend believes that the motion has sinister implications. It would be interesting to know what they are. I am sure that my hon. Friend does not wish to suggest that the outcome of tonight's vote will in any way reflect upon the need, or otherwise, for a vote on amendment No. 27.

Mr. Dykes: My hon. Friend's intervention is totally astonishing. If we assume that the motion of the right hon. Member for Chesterfield is carried, is it not right to reflect on the implications of the collapse in the credibility of the business of the House in general, not just in respect of this piece of legislation? The reasons for the silly suspicions of a conspiracy are self-evident. I need not go into them. Instead, I shall refer to the assertions that, in my estimation, were wrongly made about a Scottish television interview.

I did not see the interview, but the assertions relate to an answer given to television viewers by the Chairman of Ways and Means. Subject to an examination of the text of his answer, it seems to me incredible that the Chairman of Ways and Means would say on television that he never gives reasons and that, despite the fact that he was giving a television interview, it was none of the interviewer's business and that he would not answer the question. Answers in a television interview are, surely, totally different and, in any case, discursive, wide-ranging, colloquial and different from literal answers that are given in the Chamber of the House of Commons.

The idea that that is the same as giving reasons for selecting or not selecting an amendment for debate or vote is completely spurious, and I am surprised that people are even suggesting it.

Mr. Cryer: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dykes: I may give way, but not for the moment.

The Leader of the House presented his argument briefly but with great skill. He is known to be not only a very good Leader of the House but a very fair-minded person who always makes his points in a calm, balanced and dispassionate way. I was glad that on this occasion he had a note of justified indignation in his voice when he rejected the motion and asked for it to be defeated in the appropriate manner. The majority of hon. Members are extremely annoyed and fed up about the fact that the motion has even been presented.

[Mr. Dykes]

Although a majority have spoken against the motion, the anti-Europe and, for the purposes of this debate, the anti-Chair speakers—I use that description deliberately although they deny it—have repeated exactly the points of order made for more than an hour at the beginning of this week. Their arguments were a complete rerun, and nothing new has been added. There has been no justification for the motion. Even the right hon. Member for Chesterfield has fallen asleep—he is either bored with my words or with the text of his own motion. It is essential for the House to reject the motion decisively with a crushing defeat.

I am not defending a personality, although I agree with the repeated assertions, which have also been made by the critics, that the present Chairman of Ways and Means has done an outstanding job throughout the Committee stage. The reason I am genuinely indignant about the motion —as are other hon. Members—is that I am worried about paralysing the authority of the Chair in the future. From now on, there would be perpetual questioning of the Chair's motives——

Mr. Cryer: The hon. Gentleman keeps asserting that the Chair's decisions are always universally accepted. However, on a controversial issue in 1976, for example, the Speaker—not the Chair—made a decision against the hybridity of a Bill. He said that that was his final ruling and that, if hon. Members disagreed with it, they should table the usual motion—a motion of no confidence. The Conservative Opposition at the time did not wrap their cloaks around them and go home but persuaded the Speaker to change his decision because they did not agree with it. Were they wrong to do so?

Mr. Dykes: I did not mean that one should automatically reject the remote possibility of such an event arising in the House on rare occasions. That would be manifestly absurd. What I object to is the fact that the right hon. Member for Chesterfield did not table the motion as a motion of censure or of no confidence but tried to tone it down to make it more acceptable. That is the danger of the text.

I hope that the Opposition Front Bench spokesman is listening. I noticed that the shadow Leader of the House carefully did not respond—I do not think that she could at that stage—to the question asked by the former leader of the Liberal Democrats who is now a foreign affairs spokesman. The question was about the comparison between new clauses 74 and 75 and amendment No. 27 which, as has rightly been said, we have already passed by in Committee, subject to any re-presentation on Report. I hope that the question will be answered because it is important.

I am not assuming the construction of any reasons why the Chair should have selected an amendment or new clause for a vote. In my opinion, no reasons need to be given. I accept the Chair's decision. Many of the Chair's selections have been very much against the Government's interest and there have, quite rightly, been no complaints about that.

Mr. George Robertson: The hon. Gentleman should have listened to my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) as he is accusing other people of not having listened. My right hon. Friend spelt out the position in some detail. Amendment No. 27 and new clauses 74 and 75 may have the same ultimate objective —to put pressure on the Government to accept the social chapter—but they do so in two entirely different ways. From the beginning, we have never accepted that they were alternatives. They have separate functions, which is why amendment No. 27 was pressed and why subsequent amendments were tabled, officially and by Back Benchers, to find a way to achieve the basic objective. My right hon. Friend made that point and we stand by it.

Mr. Dykes: In that case, it is funny that the shadow Leader of the House did not answer the question in that way. I think that there is a disagreement among members of the Labour Front Bench and among Labour Members. Be that as it may, we are getting back to the idea that the Chair should, through the motion and outrageous pressure from a minority of hon. Members, apparently be coerced to give reasons for the selection or otherwise of amendments, either for debate or vote. I reject that idea out of hand, except perhaps once every few decades in 1 per cent. of parliamentary opportunities and in a truly outrageous case.

The Chair's decision was a routine and justified decision, although I concede that amendment No. 27 is very important. The motion is disgraceful, and the quicker it is unequivocally defeated, the better.

5.35 pm

Mr. Michael J. Martin (Glasgow, Springburn): Like all members of the Opposition, I am keen to get the social chapter included in the treaty. I hope that it will be possible on Report, because many of my constituents and people in Scotland generally have very low-paid jobs and need the protection of legislation, whether it comes from the House or from Europe. However, I support the Chairman of Ways and Means. I am reminded of a discussion that took place last night in the Tea Room. A young colleague summed up the issue very well by saying that one cannot have a football match without a referee, which is what the motion is trying to do.

For seven years, I have been a member of the Chairmen's Panel, and have throughly enjoyed it. I have learnt a great deal about the procedure of Committees and the House, and about amendments. Above all, I have learnt that one cannot please everyone. It is very difficult to do so, and it is natural that, when the Chairman decides in favour of one side, the other side is displeased. I do not think that any Chairman, including the Chairman of Ways and Means, would do anything to harm the integrity of the position that he or she holds. The strength of the House of Commons is that those who chair our Committees are constituency Members of Parliament. When they listen to the arguments made by hon. Members, they can easily put themselves in their position. They know what it is to be in a minority, trying to appeal to the Chair.

I recall a humorous situation that occurred in the Scottish Grand Committee. I was in the impossible position of trying to call as many Back Benchers as I could, including those from the minority parties. Inevitably, some hon. Members were squeezed out. One hon. Member spoke to me during one sitting, and the language he used would have made a navvy blush—it certainly made me blush. He gave me a great deal of abuse. I told him that the reason he was not called was that I had to call the Scottish National party, but I still got the abuse. Six months later, that Labour Member was in the SNP and was shouting about the SNP not getting enough time on the Floor of the House. One cannot win.

On another occasion, the Clerk informed me that I could allow the Committee to sit 10 minutes beyond 1 pm to dispose of the business. I thought that everyone would be delighted about that, but a member of the Committee told me that he was not pleased because it meant that he would be late for his luncheon engagement, so he intended to report me to the Speaker.

I was in the House last Thursday and heard the discussion. I was aware of the high feelings. You will have noticed, Madam Speaker, that for many years I have chosen to sit here below the Gangway, and I enjoy the banter of my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), who sits nearby. I admire his sharp wit and the way that he gives Ministers and Conservatives in general a hard time—he gives the Opposition Front-Bench spokespersons an even harder time. He is at his best in such situations, but he is certainly not at his best when he starts making personal attacks. I dissociate myself from terms such as "stitch-up" and "deals with the Government". I do not think that such remarks are helpful.

If we want people to accept positions of responsibility, by all means we can criticise them, so long as it is fair criticism, but personal attacks do not help. I was brought up in the trade union and labour movement, and because of the disadvantaged situation from which I came, I acquired most of my education from attending trade union and Labour party meetings. I would not have had that education, and I would have not been capable of being a Member of Parliament, had it not been for strong chairmanship. One thing that I learned early was that, when things go against someone, he should fight his corner and keep fighting, but the last thing he should do is blame the chairman.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): The hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) referred to the occasion on which the Speaker's ruling on the Aircraft and Shipbuilding Industries Bill was—disgracefully, I believe—overruled by the Government. The manner in which the decision had been arrived at was significant. I was involved to some extent, because I was then the legal adviser to the ship repairers, so I was well acquainted with what was going on. The decision was disgraceful, and there was no basis whatever on which anyone could derive any satisfaction from ignoring a ruling of the Speaker or, indeed, of the Chairman of Ways and Means.

I have not put my name to the motion, but that does not mean that I have not been seriously concerned about the difficulties that have arisen over amendment No. 27, primarily because, as I said about the Aircraft and Shipbuilding Industries Bill, the object of the procedure is more important than all the arcane technicalities that prevail at the end of the day. Underneath all the precedents, we are really discussing a simple question: should the House of Commons be able to put to the vote a matter of vital interest to the people outside, whether in terms of the social chapter or of taxation and the agreement? The real problem is that the people outside simply will not be able to understand why, in simple language, after all the debate that has taken place, we cannot have a vote on amendment No. 27.

Miss Emma Nicholson (Torridge and Devon, West): Surely the argument is not about whether the people outside understand why we do or do not have a vote. The people outside frequently do not understand our complex procedures. The object of the debate is to determine whether the Chairman of Ways and Means has authority over the Chamber. That is the question today. We cannot have a form of mob rule. As the hon. Member for Glasgow, Springburn (Mr. Martin) said, it is difficult enough being a Member of Parliament. We must make our own judgments, and occupants of the Chair must make theirs. They should not be a football to be kicked about on the whim of other hon. Members such as my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash).

Mr. Cash: I do not believe that I have put forward any views on the subject on the basis of a whim. The problem is that the issue has become Byzantine because, although we are told that no reasons are given, unless we subscribe to the notion of the hypocrisy of democracy, we know perfectly well that reasons have been given. In the light of the television transcript that we have seen and of statements that have been recorded in Hansard, it is perfectly ludicrous to say that no reasons have been given.

We have been clearly told that one of the problems involved with the selection of the amendment is that apparently it would wreck the Bill, and we must have regard to the effect that it would have on the Bill. That was said in so many words in the television programme. I see that the Chairman of Ways and Means is shaking his head, so I shall read out the transcript, because we must have a clear understanding. In reply to an interviewer's question the transcript records that he said:

> "Well you have to go back to the fact that there was a significant 2nd reading vote for the Bill therefore the House has already said, as it moved into Committee, that it wanted the Bill to go through and that it would accept amendments on the workings of the Bill, like the one we have got on the Committee of the Regions where they change the basis of who shall be appointed, but you cannot wreck the Bill but you can put in these sort of caveats and in a sense this one is a caveat and a very strong moral one actually, because what it really says is that yes the Bill can go through but the House will have to have a vote after the Royal Assent on whether or not it wants the Social Chapter in there."

Earlier, referring to another amendment, which must have been new clause 75, the Chairman said:

> "to put down an amendment which is more workable than 27 and that is what has actually come out."

I am now at a slight disadvantage, because I see that the Chairman of Ways and Means, in a sedentary position, is shaking his head. I should be more than happy to withdraw my reference if what I have is not a verbatim transcript, but I can use only the evidence before me. I am simply making a point that is reiterated in column 39 of the Official Report of 19 April—perhaps we are entitled to put more emphasis on that than on a television interview. I am glad to see that my hon. Friend the Chairman of Ways and Means is now nodding his head. In respect of amendment No. 27 he said:

> "In arriving at such a decision . . . any occupant of the Chair must have regard to a number of factors, including the Committee's debates, the clarity of effect of an amendment, and its impact on the Bill which, if brought into effect, must be both workable and understandable. In the very nature of this case, there can be no exact precedent."—[Official Report, 19 April 1993; Vol. 223, c. 39.]

My right hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery) referred to the MacAndrew case, but the Chairman of Ways and Means has made it clear that he had to form his judgment on the issue before him. The problem that I have with the reasons that he has given leads me to be concerned about the basis upon which that decision was made. It is conceded that there is no precedent, because such matters must be regarded as being taken separately on each occasion.

That being said, let us consider the questions that are put to us. In my view, they merely compound the Byzantine nature of the position that we are already in, because if the reasons that we have been given were applied on future occasions they would cause an unbelievable amount of difficulty. Who is to decide on the "clarity of effect" of an amendment? It is sometimes exceedingly difficult, without waiting for the matter to be referred to the courts, to know what decision will be taken on the meaning to be drawn from a specific form of words. In the European dimension, considering the methods of interpretation now applied in the European courts as compared with those used in our own courts, that becomes even more difficult. The considerations are to be:

"the clarity of effect of an amendment, and its impact on the Bill".

The reference to the amendment's impact on the Bill is similar to the reference in the television transcript to which I have just referred. I am very concerned about the impact on the Bill. Although no reasons have been given for the reference, I believe that it refers to Second Reading, which was mentioned in the television transcript, and the impact that amendment No. 27, if passed, would have on the process of the treaty and the Bill. It has been decided effectively to remove amendment No. 27 from the amendment paper.

The Bill received a majority of 244 on Second Reading. However, Second Reading occurred a very long time ago, on 2 May last year. Since then, there has been a referendum in Denmark. Therefore, we are not dealing with the same agreement or treaty that was signed on 7 February because the Danish people are——

Madam Speaker: Order. I have been very tolerant, but I am now insisting that the hon. Gentleman should speak to the motion before the House. The debate is limited to the exercise of the Chair's discretion on amendment No. 27. It is limited only to that and not to the Danish referendum or to what anyone else does in any other country. It is limited simply to the judgment and discretion of the Chairman of Ways and Means: that is all.

Mr. Cash: Indeed, Madam Speaker, and I am happy to follow your ruling. I am referring to the impact on the Bill and that was the reason given by the Chairman of Ways and Means. That causes me concern because the principle of the Bill on Second Reading has been breached by our withdrawal from the exchange rate mechanism. If we are not to have a Division on amendment No. 27 and the reason for that—although it is not entirely disclosed—is the effect that it would have in respect of Second Reading, that is not a justifiable reason for there to be no Division on the amendment.

According to the motion and to the comments of the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), the amendment must be workable and understandable. That point has already been discussed. By providing new criteria, there will be enormous difficulties in respect of future rulings.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): I have listened with great care to my hon. Friend who, unlike me, is not one of the minority of hon. Members to whom the procedures of the House are sometimes arcane. I have examined pages 491 to 493 of "Erskine May". It is clear that the intelligibility and the workability of an amendment are criteria which Chairmen of Committees have taken into account for many years. Is my hon. Friend saying that they are new criteria?

Mr. Cash: Those of us who have examined the same provisions are perfectly aware that it may be a question of grammar or logic. However, there is no question about the meaning to be attached to amendment No. 27. It is crystal clear. The problem is about workability and understandability in relation to the Bill which received its Second Reading by a substantial majority and in respect of which the landscape has changed fundamentally since then.

The Chairman of Ways and Means told me that it was not the length of debate in question, but the content that was the issue. However, I want to query another issue that has not been mentioned so far in this debate. If we were to be confined in this way, it would be impossible for anyone to know whether the content of an amendment would lead to its being ruled out of order in respect of a Division.

That raises yet another problem: what is the content of a debate? Some debates are immensely interesting and some are exceedingly difficult to understand. The reality is that we cannot become locked into an argument about content as opposed to length because that would confuse matters.

It is equally clear that, in respect of amendments tabled on Report, "Erskine May" states:

"In particular, amendments are sometimes tabled to reverse Government defeats in Committee and these are always selected."

That means that Governments always have the right to obtain a reversal on Report. Presumably that will apply to the vote on the Committee of the Regions. "Erskine May" continues:

"In general, amendments which were debated at length"—

it does not say anything about content—

"in Committee, and brought to a vote, are not selected by the Speaker for further debate on Report. Amendments only briefly debated and which were then withdrawn, may well be selected if time permits."

However, the Chairman is on record as having made it perfectly clear that one of the prime reasons why amendment No. 27 was not selected for a Division was that the length of the debate and presumably also its content were not substantial. I believe that that is extraordinary having regard to the column inches devoted to that amendment. If we move to another stage, I find it difficult to understand how such matters might not be considered.

We must also bear in mind that the House of Lords would not be able to consider the tax implications of amendment No. 27. Furthermore, with respect to the whole issue of tax which has been thoroughly debated this afternoon, we must consider whether we have a right to determine the issues that arise under the agreement vested in amendment No. 27.

When considering the remarks of the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, my right hon. Friend the Member for Watford (Mr. Garel-Jones), and the Chairman of the Ways and Means last week, I found it strange and opaque to discover that a new kind of doctrine appeared to be emerging—that the Government deserve protection if they find themselves in a minority. Some of the proceedings last week, in respect of the comments of the Minister of State and the Chairman of Ways and Means, would repay detailed consideration.

Mr. Whitney: Before my hon. Friend concludes his remarks, will he clarify a problem that is puzzling some of us? Some of us have noticed that three of our hon. Friends have signed the motion that we are debating. However, the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) is missing from that list. Many of us would be interested to know why his name does not appear, given the strength of feeling that, at his usual generous length, he is now offering to the House in respect of the views and conduct of the Chairman of Ways and Means. Can my hon. Friend tell us which way he will be voting in the Lobby, as that would also be of interest to hon. Members?

Mr. Cash: I do not have the slightest intention of disclosing in advance how I will vote. However, I do not believe that the motion is sensible, for the simple reason that I do not believe that we need to hype the issue into a censure motion. Substantive questions arise and I am addressing them.

We would be neglecting the responsibility vested in us, given the fact that I raised points of order on the matter in the past, if we did not follow through the logic of what has been happening. It is not in the interests of the House, for the reasons that I have given, for us to be taken down this route by the judgment on amendment No. 27. That is the point that I am making.

With respect to the implications of declining a Division on amendment No. 27, "Erskine May" states:

> "The Speaker's guiding principle is to avoid debate on the Floor of the House which is simply a repetition of the debate in Committee and where exactly the same decision may be expected on the amendment or amendments concerned."

If there is no vote, exactly the same decision will be taken because no opportunity for a vote will have been offered. There is ample opportunity for this matter to be reconsidered without getting into a tremendous hysterical turmoil about whether the Chairman made the right decision. I am happy to accept that he made the best judgment at the time. The question must be: was it the right judgment and has it led us into an impossible Byzantine position which can be resolved on Report?

Another reference to the Speaker's criteria, which was set out by Speaker King, is that all Government amendments are usually selected. Therefore, given the importance of this matter to the Government, and the fact that amendment No. 27 is in the name of the Leader of the Opposition, that presents an extremely good reason for selecting it subsequently.

Mr. Rooker: Surely the hon. Gentleman is overstating the case. The amendments in the name of the hon. Member in charge of the Bill are selected virtually automatically. If this were a private Member's Bill, the amendments of the hon. Member who introduced it would be selected. Government amendments have been selected only because the Minister is in charge of the Bill.

Mr. Cash: That is a fair point: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. I have simply set out what "Erskine May" says:

> "The Speakers usually select . . . important issues fully debated in committee, but still containing vital matters worthy of a 'last look'."

That seems to be the basis on which there will be ample opportunity, after this debate is finished, to re-examine amendment No. 27, which is of enormous importance politically and constitutionally. Undoubtedly, it is an important and vital issue. I believe that it is worthy of a last look.

6.2 pm

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): I hope that I do not have to travel or take anyone down these Byzantine ways. I have heard hon. Members on both sides of the House talking about the matter, and I want to be as clear as I possibly can. I shall kick off by saying that we do not need any lectures from Euro-fanatics such as the hon. Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) about ensuring that democracy in the House of Commons remains. He has been at the forefront of ensuring that power has been taken away from the House of Commons to Brussels, Bonn, Strasbourg, Luxembourg and anywhere else on the continent. We do not need any lectures from Euro-fanatics about undermining democracy in the House.

Mr. Dykes: The hon. Gentleman is wrong about the treaty. As he knows, the treaty as debated provides for a reinforcement of the powers and involvement of all national parliaments, including the House of Commons.

Mr. Skinner: There has been a hidden agenda in the Common Market since it began on 28 October 1971. Before the hon. Gentleman became a Member of Parliament, he was campaigning outside for the European Movement. He is telling hon. Members in the House, " We are not going to do anything important today. We will pass a little treaty, but don't worry—nothing will happen". There has been a hidden agenda.

Madam Speaker: Order. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will not allow himself to be moved away from the motion on the Order Paper by such interventions.

Mr. Skinner: It is important to remember that we are talking against the background of a shift in power from this place to the Common Market. The whole argument, like the previous one in which Grant-Ferris was involved, was about the Common Market. It has bedevilled the House of Commons almost all the time that I have been a Member of Parliament.

Some of the greatest problems which have arisen in the House of Commons have done so because we are a member of the Common Market. The split in the Labour party, the split in the Tory party and all the rest of it are attributable to the fact that many hon. Members in the House and many millions of people outside believe that we made a big mistake.

Mr. Stephen Milligan (Eastleigh): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Skinner: No—we must allow other hon. Members to speak. [Interruption.] Madam Speaker is nodding her head, so we are together; we have established a partnership.

As for all that talk about not undermining the Chair, let us have none of that nonsense. A few years ago, when Speaker Weatherill was in the Chair, there were briefings from the Government to get rid of him. All the newspapers got the stories about how the Prime Minister wanted to get the Speaker out of the Chair. We know the stories. Conservative Members were briefing all the time.

Let us not be lily-livered about the fact that the Chairman of Ways and Means is under the microscope because Mrs. Thatcher and the rest of them were quite happy to tell Weatherill, indirectly through the newspapers, "Get on your bike. We have had enough of you. We want somebody else in your place". Weatherill was smart enough to talk to Members of Parliament that he thought might help him to stay in his job. That is the background.

Let us not have any more talk from those pompous people that somehow or other we cannot discuss the Chair in the House of Commons. It happens in every other organisation that I know about. I had not been chair of the Labour party for five minutes before nearly every right-wing member of the national executive committee tried to move me out at the first meeting. My right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) stood by me, but he had a job to get a seconder.

All the hon. Members on the Labour Front Bench, who were members of the NEC, were not bothered about undermining the authority of the chair. I was right. I had only quoted the standing orders, but that was enough for them. They did not like the standing orders—they are all standing orders—and they were prepared to kick me out of the chair at the first meeting. I stood my ground. I did not go whining to people and saying, "Isn't it terrible? How can I manage?" I fought on.

I do not know what this place is coming to when hon. Members cannot make comments about the Chair. The Chairman made a series of mistakes—not just one. He got caught up in the 20th century and television. Some people said that television would not alter this place. It has altered this place, and the Chairman of Ways and Means. I do not say that in a machiavellian way. The Chairman went on television. Like all people who go on television, he was asked awkward questions and responded.

It is time that we stopped this nonsense of saying that the Chair cannot explain. Is it time to stop it? We are approaching the 21st century, and a leading Member in the House of Commons is not able to tell the assembled Members, "The reason why I am not selecting your amendment or putting it to the vote is the following." Let us grow up. Let us start to explain so that people fully understand. What is it about the mythology of this place that somehow or other we wrap the Chair in a cocoon? What is it all for? It is high time that we understood more clearly. The Chair was wrong on 22 February when he said that there would be a vote. Surely we should be allowed to make the point in the House.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield and I were brought up in different ways, although we agree on many things. He is a sensitive old soul. Today, he said that the motion was not an attack on the Chairman of Ways and Means. I think it is. I have never thought any different —I had to tell my right hon. Friend that last night. The motion is an attack on the Chairman. It is not a personal attack in the sense that hon. Members do not like him: it is an attack on his judgment. Some of us feel that he made the wrong one.

What is wrong with being able to say that from time to time? That is against a background of a Tory party which, only a few years ago, told the Prime Minister, "Get on your bike". They chucked her out like a dog in the night.

Now, those same sensitive souls, such as the right hon. Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery), who was probably one of those who chucked her out, and the hon. Member for Harrow, East—they were part and parcel of that great vote—try to tell us that we cannot discuss these other matters in here. They stand here talking about the pomp and ceremony of this place. The previous Prime Minister got thrown out without a majority vote. There was no majority to kick her out, but she went, just as many others have done.

I will tell the House why I believe that some of the people here are not keen on passing a motion against the Chairman of Ways and Means. They are afraid that he might resign. He is an honourable man. I am sure that he would resign. I put another proposition to the Chairman of Ways and Means. I think that he should not resign. He should come back and say, "We should have a vote on something similar to amendment No. 27." I would back him in the Chair if he said that.

So what is it? Do people not want him to resign because the Government have at least 15 members of the Cabinet who ought to resign? It might catch on. They might say, "We cannot afford to let him go, because people might think we should go. He has been an honourable man." That is the last thing that this Tory Government want.

There is a hidden agenda. I do not have any hang-ups about it. It was a stitch-up from beginning to end. I do not believe that, in this modern age, especially with television, it is possible for the Chair not to know what the Government are up to. I find that incredible. When a debate is closed after three, four or five hours in the middle of the night, do people expect me to believe that there has not been a discussion between the Chair and the Chief Whip or one of his people? I do not believe it. Of course it is done, and I expect it to be done. This place could not be run without that sort of collaboration.

I am also in favour of the motion because I have seen power removed from Back Benchers in the 23 years that I have been a Member of Parliament. The motion is not merely about Mr. Morris. When my hon. Friends go into the Lobby, as assuredly we will, they should realise that, in the past 23 years, this Government and Governments before them have taken power to themselves over and over again.

There was a time when the Government had to close the summer and spring Adjournment motion debates. Now the debates last only three hours. We used to fight on the Consolidated Fund Bill right through the night and the following morning and cock up the Government's business for the next day. Now all that has gone. There was a time when there was no such thing as 10-minute limits on speeches for Back-Bench Members after 6 and 7 o'clock. Now there is a limit, but the Front-Bench spokesmen still have their 30, 40 or 50 minutes.

We never used to have guillotines such as we have now. When I came into the House, it was extremely rare for a guillotine to be put on. The practice has grown over the years. That is all part of the same business.

The power that the Government have today is enormous by comparison with what Governments had previously. On this occasion, Back Benchers want to assert some authority, but in the end it is about Speakers and their role in relation to Back Benchers. Speakers all claim to be on the side of the Back Benchers. They say that they will preserve and safeguard the interests of Back Benchers. The truth is that that is not always the case.

Speaker Lenthall said, "I have neither eye to see," and the rest of it. On this occasion, my view—for what it is worth—is that the Chairman of Ways and Means did not act like Speaker Lenthall. He acted on behalf of the Government. The result was that we lost a great opportunity to score a great wounding victory against the Government on amendment No. 27. That is what really happened. It sticks in my craw. No one will convince me otherwise. I believe that, instead of standing his ground, Morris surrendered not only to the Government but, sadly, whether he knows it or not, to Brussels. That is why I shall vote for the motion.

Mr. Iain Duncan-Smith (Chingford): It is a case of "Follow that", but I shall endeavour to do so in a short speech, to allow others to speak.

I have listened to right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House. Having heard many of the speeches made throughout the Committee stage, I had a sense of deja vu, but at least it was a comfortable one. I listened particularly carefully to the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn). Clearly, his knowledge of procedure is far ahead of anything that I could possibly rival. I do not intend to be caught up in that argument.

I am against the Maastricht process and treaty. That is fairly clear to hon. Members on both sides of the House. I have made my position pretty clear. I was and am disappointed that amendment No. 27 was not put to a vote. However, I believe that the important thing is to make my views clear on the Chairman of Ways and Means, who has behaved wholly honourably and in a fair manner throughout the Committee stage.

Therefore, one must ask whether the motion will be perceived in the way that the right hon. Member for Chesterfield explained it. I have no doubt that the right hon. Gentleman and others, especially the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), believe that it is not absolutely a motion of censure. It is not written exactly in those terms. But the problem is that the motion will be perceived as a motion of censure on someone who has behaved honourably in reaching his decision.

As I said, I am disappointed that the Chairman's decision precluded a vote on amendment No. 27. I hope that, on Report, you will review that decision, Madam Speaker, and for your own reasons come to a decision that may well allow the House to vote on amendment No. 27.

The problem with the motion is that the mechanism —as far as I can tell from the procedure of the House—is such that there is no way in which the outcome of the vote tonight, whatever it may be, will allow a vote on amendment No. 27. Therefore, it is bound to be perceived wholly as a motion of censure. That is why I am opposed to it.

Therefore, I hope and wish that the right hon. Member for Chesterfield and the other right hon. and hon. Gentlemen who put their names to it will carefully examine the motion again and, before we reach the stage at which it is necessary to proceed to a vote, withdraw it. It would be in the best interests of the House not to have the motion pressed to a vote, to proceed to the remaining stages of the Committee proceedings and the Report stage and, hopefully, to a vote on amendment No. 27.

6.17 pm

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): I make it clear from the start, speaking as the second signatory to the motion, that no personal attack is intended. I do not agree with the attack in the forthright speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) on the conduct and motivation of the Chairman of Ways and Means. I take the view that Sir Elwyn Jones, as he then was, took when he moved a similar motion against the Chair in 1972. He said:

"Least of all is it an imputation . . . against his good faith and integrity."—[Official Report, 1 March 1972; Vol. 832, c. 434.]

There is no such intention.

I respect the Chair, as I believe other Members do. I have considerable regard for those who have the difficult task of occupying it and conducting the business of the House. However, while I have respect for the Chair and its occupants, I do not believe that they are infallible. From time to time, we perform a service to the House and the country when we subject certain rulings to serious debate and scrutiny.

That is precisely what we are doing. Through our actions this afternoon, we have done a considerable service to the House. I refuse to be buried by a load of humbug —the suggestion that Members never have the right to question the Chair about any matter. The people making that accusation know jolly well that it is over 20 years since, on another matter of vast importance, such a motion was moved. Therefore, let us dispense with that argument straight away.

Happily, I do not have to go over the background, as that has inevitably been done by previous speakers. I shall turn to what is almost the crux of the matter. Amendment No. 27 was moved from the Front Bench. My right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham), who moved the group of amendments, immediately made it plain that, although the lead amendment was amendment No. 7, he was not interested in that one, would not be talking to it and would withdraw it. He emphasised that the debate was about amendment No. 27. It was not only my right hon. Friend who asserted that: the rest of the Committee concurred, because it knew that amendment No. 27 was the most important amendment in the group. The Committee then debated it as such.

We know that the Government were horrified at the prospect of the amendment. The Minister of State said that it would wreck the Bill and the treaty as soon as he heard of my right hon. Friend's intention to insist on pressing the amendment to a vote. We then had the extraordinary incident of the Foreign Secretary coming to the House to repudiate on the advice of the Law Officers what the Minister of State had said. He said that the Minister had got it wrong and amendment No. 27 would have no effect on the treaty's ratification and the conclusion of the Bill. We took that advice with the scepticism that such contradictory advice deserved.

The Chairman of the Committee was not particularly impressed, either. In a statement on 22 February, he said that he was minded to take another debate on the important matter before he allowed a vote on amendment No. 27. The clear implication was that we should vote on the matter, and the Chairman had not been swayed by what the Attorney-General or the Minister of State had said in earlier debates.

We now come to the heart of the matter. What happened? Why did the Chairman of Ways and Means change his mind after serious consideration? He first announced that he would select, not amendment No. 27, but different amendments, particularly new clause 75. He told us that first, I think, on 30 March. He then met a number of anxious hon. Members who thought that that would be a great mistake, and he reconsidered the issue and came forward on Thursday 15 April with further confirmation of his intention to select new clause 75 and not allow a vote on amendment No. 27.

The Chairman's restatement led to considerable concern in the Committee and, after a long period of questions to the Chairman of Ways and Means, there was a debate in which the matters were thrashed out yet again. We came to the last stage of this when, on Monday, the Chairman reaffirmed his decision not to call amendment No. 27.

As the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) and my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover said, the Chairman has helped the Committee by making statements on the reasons for his decisions. He opened proceedings on 19 April with a statement to the Committee about "the context in which my decision not to allow a separate Division to amendment No. 27 was taken."

He said that the context included a number of factors such as the extent of the Committee's debate

"the clarity and effect of an amendment, and its impact on the Bill."—[Official Report, 19 April 1993; Vol. 223, c. 39.]

The Chairman gave an interview, not just on Scottish television, but on BBC2 on Tuesday 13 April, the full text of which a number of hon. Members have seen, and a copy of which I have with me today. The Chairman was specifically asked about his selection of new clause 75 in place of amendment No. 27—indeed, why else would he appear on the programme? The Chairman was reported to have said:

"You have got to go back to the fact that there was a significant Second Reading for the Bill. Therefore, the House had already said, as it moved into Committee, that it wanted the Bill to go through, that it would accept amendments on the workings of the Bill, like the one we have got on the Committee of the Regions, but you cannot wreck the Bill."

Clearly, the Chairman considered that amendment No. 27 is or was a wrecking amendment. He made clear his views on new clause 75, the alternative choice, when he said:

"What it really says"—

new clause 75—

"is that, yes, the Bill can go through, but the House shall have to have a vote after the Royal Assent on whether or not it wants the social chapter."

There is a world of difference between amendments with such different effects. Despite what the Attorney-General said, amendment No. 27 would wreck the Bill and bring it to a halt. We know perfectly well that new clause 75, backed up by new clause 74, would have no such effect, and the Bill would receive Royal Assent.

The issue lies at the heart of the matter. It makes plain the enormous difference between the effects of amendment No. 27 and new clauses 75 and 74. Not surprisingly, the Government have said that they would have no difficulty in accepting new clause 75. They have no difficulty with that new clause, because they know that it will not stop the Bill and ratification of the treaty. The new clause is sufficiently vague not to lead to a satisfactory conclusion.

Mr. Geoffrey Hoon (Ashfield): I refer my right hon. Friend to the words of new clause 74, which states that the Bill cannot come into force before there is a debate on the social chapter. Therefore, it follows that the Government could not ratify the treaty before that debate has taken place.

Mr. Shore: We shall see what the Government have to say and whether they would find any difficulty with it when we reach that stage. As we well know, as the vote on the social chapter is to be taken after Royal Assent, it will have an entirely different effect from a vote on amendment No. 27, which would prevent the Bill from receiving Royal Assent. There is a major difference between the two.

I do not understand why it is said that, because amendment No. 27 stops or wrecks the Bill, it cannot be voted on because the House has given the Bill a Second Reading. Surely, if it were considered a wrecking amendment, it should never have been called in the first place—indeed, it would not have been called in the first place. The Chairman allowed it to appear among the selected amendments because he did not consider it to be a wrecking amendment. If it was a wrecking amendment, it should have been disqualified from the start, but it was not.

Secondly, and even more puzzlingly, the Chair has already allowed a number of amendments—after they have been properly selected and debated—to be put to the vote. We had votes on amendment No. 79, which sought to remove the clause and the protocol relating to excessive deficits. It was selected, we debated it and then voted on it. No one could deny that the effect of my amendment No. 79 would be to wreck the Bill—it would have virtually torn the heart out of economic and monetary union.

The same was true, not only of my other amendment No. 81, which was similarly voted on and rejected, but of a number of other amendments which would have wrecked the Bill, and which were moved, debated and voted on. They would have prevented the treaty from being ratified.

Mr. George Robertson: Perhaps I can stop my right hon. Friend going down this route. Earlier, my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) made it clear that we are arguing, certainly from the Front Bench, that the Chairman of Ways and Means has already said that amendment No. 27 has integrity and does not fail the test.

I know that my right hon. Friend does not have the pleasure and privilege of living in Scotland, but if he had, he would have seen BBC Scotland's admirable "Scottish Lobby" programme at 12 o'clock on Sunday, on which the Chairman of Ways and Means was interviewed again. He said that, had subsequent amendments not been tabled, he supposed that there might well have been a vote on amendment No. 27.

Therefore, my right hon. Friend's argument on the basis of the first interview does not stand, because the Chairman has told the wider world, certainly Scotland, that amendment No. 27 has integrity. That is the argument that we shall be using on Report to convince you, Madam Speaker, that you should select it.

Mr. Shore: My hon. Friend is confusing the House, and not for the first time. He is contradicting the right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) who spoke earlier and his right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham), the shadow Foreign Secretary, both of whom have made it plain that there is a world of difference between amendment No. 27 and new clauses 74 and 75, and that they will continue to plead, argue and persuade that there should be a vote on it.

If there is a vote on it, that will not please my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson), as it will have the effect, at least for a time, of bringing the treaty and its procedures to a stop. That is a matter on which we fundamentally disagree. That brings me to my last point, which is why I think that this is such an important matter.

Mr. Spearing: My right hon. Friend is making an important point about whether or not the Chair can select, let alone put to the vote, a matter which he regards as a wrecking amendment. Surely the whole problem is the difference between wrecking the Bill, which I do not think my right hon. Friend's amendment would do, and wrecking the treaty, which might well happen if the Bill becomes an Act. We are in a double-decked situation.

Mr. Shore: It would have the effect of wrecking the treaty, and that is the important objective that I, personally, wish to achieve, without any doubt, concealment or apology.

I now come to the final significance of amendment No. 27. Uniquely, it combines two features. First, it is the only amendment moved by the Opposition and properly debated which has been denied a vote. Even people such as myself, now a humble Back Bencher, have had amendments debated and voted upon in the middle of the night. My amendments were far more damaging than anything that was moved by the Front Bench.

Secondly, it is the only amendment on which we and the Government know that they are likely to be defeated. It is the only amendment of serious substance, because there has been so much general tacit agreement among the three major parties and their leadership that the House will not be able to make such a challenge to the Bill and the treaty on any other issue. That unique combination makes amendment No. 27 essential to the good reputation of the House and its continued esteem among our fellow citizens.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): I am sorry that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House introduced the Government's response to the debate in the way that he did. He implied that anyone who was concerned about this issue was critical of my hon. Friend the Chairman of Ways and Means.

My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, South (Mr. Morris) and I have the privilege of sharing parliamentary responsibility for Northampton. Before he was elevated to his present, highly responsible position, I thought that he was a mere mortal and a human being. Since he has taken on responsibility for the most difficult parliamentary procedure since I have been a Member of Parliament, he has behaved in a most superhuman way. I am not given to ladling on the syrup. The Chairman of Ways and Means has performed magnificently and I am delighted and overwhelmed that a Member for Northampton has responsibility for this Bill dealing with such an important measure. But—[Interruption.] It is the old political trick of ascribing to people with whom one disagrees motives that they do not have. We are not critical of the Chairman of Ways and Means; we admire him and the way in which he has carried out his duties and responsibilities. He has been highly responsive, articulate and effective.

My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House says that if we want to say anything about the motion we are attacking the Chair. We are not. We are saying something about the motion because we want a vote on amendment No. 27.

As the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) said when he introduced the debate, where is the court of appeal? The Chairman of Ways and Means has made a decision and some of us disagree. We think that it is an important decision on an important issue. In this House of Commons, are we not able to express our concern and our desire to do something else?

My hon. Friend the Chairman of Ways and Means has performed magnificently. At some stage in future we may have a Chairman of Ways and Means who does not do so, who is culpable and makes mistakes. Is my right hon. Friend saying that in those circumstances the House must roll on its back and enjoy it and do nothing about it? Is that what democracy is about? Is that what my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House wants the House to do —not to have a view or a voice on the most important issue that has come before this House, this Parliament and this people in the past 25 years?

I refer to page 405 of "Erskine May". The Chair is not required to give reasons and we all understand— [Interruption.] Most of us understand why. I respect the speech by the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), but I disagree with him on that point.

"Erskine May" states:

"Selection is made by the Chair" and one of the things that is taken into account is the prevention of "repetition and overlapping". It may well be that repetition and overlapping were considered when the Chairman was looking at new clauses 74 and 75 and amendment No. 27. But they do not overlap; they are different in detail. Amendment No. 27 has financial implications; new clauses 74 and 75 are wholly different and the House knows that. They are different in detail and, by golly, they are different in their impact. The House should be able to vote on both.

The point has been made that we have to protect minorities. It is common ground that a majority in the House want a vote on amendment No. 27. If a minority wants a vote on an important issue, they should have one, but if a majority of the House wants it, should not the majority of the House have a vote on an important issue?

My hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) brought out the tired old cliche about the Second Reading of the Bill. The Second Reading was nearly a year ago. The world has changed and I am sorry that my hon. Friend has not changed in that long period of time. If a week is a long time in politics, a year is a generation.

Everyone would agree that the treaty of European union is a massive issue. It is irreversible. Once passed, powers will pass from this House to other institutions.

[Mr. Tony Marlow]

Rightly, our constituents are greatly concerned about that. As the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) said, amendment No. 27 carries with it massive implications. Our constituents feel that it could make a difference. On this great issue people's perceptions are vital. In this case, as we continue our debates, their perception is that the House is entitled to a vote on such a major issue. If we do not have one, orders will come from European institutions in years to come without the House having been able to vote——

Mr. Milligan rose——

Mr. Marlow: I am coming to a conclusion—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hurrah!"] What a chance to get my second wind.

The perception of our constituents is that the House must have a vote, if possible, on such an important issue.

"Erskine May" refers to the 1966-67 appendices to the minutes of evidence to the Select Committee on Procedure by the then Speaker on the Report stage of public Bills. It states that the Report stage is not unimportant.

"The Bill as it emerges from Committee is often a much modified Bill"—— this one has been modified—

"the Opposition"—

I presume, in a wider sense—

"may now have a new attitude to parts of it . . . The deliberations of the Committee, even those which have not resulted in amendments to the Bill, have often been of considerable effect on the thinking of both sides. This reveals itself at the Report stage."

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash), who spoke of important issues, carefully debated in Committee, but still containing vital matters worthy of a last look. Hence they should be selected for debate on Report. I hope, Madam Speaker, that we will be able to look at this subject again then.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): I should like to speak quietly for a moment or two to the Leader of the House and to hark back to what he said at the beginning of his speech. He used the word—I do not think I misquote him—"unpalatable". According to him, what has happened is either palatable or unpalatable, depending on whether a Member is pro or anti-European. That was the gist of what he said.

A number of us feel rather differently. Wrongly, in the view of many of my colleagues, I have from time to time voted on closures and other matters with the Government. I am a Euro-fanatic, if that is the right word, but last Thursday, although I sat here as quiet as a church mouse, I felt increasingly uncomfortable when my hon. Friends were making their points of order. It seems very odd, even to those of us who hold passionately pro-European views, that a vote should be denied us on a matter, whether one likes it or not, of enormous substance. I ask the House's forgiveness if this is not an exact analogy, but it felt rather like being a forward in a football match who knows that he was yards offside but the goal was allowed. There seemed something not quite right about the decision.

I said nothing at the time, but I was greatly influenced by the comments I heard in my constituency over the weekend. I do not suggest for a moment that all our constituents understand the finer points of "Erskine May", but somehow the fact had percolated through that the House of Commons was not acting quite properly—that there was something unfair going on. In schoolboy slang, there was a general feeling that there had been a bit of a swizz.

A deeper question was also being asked. It was voiced, too, by my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), who received a great deal of agreement from the country, last Thursday. It was to the effect that we should ask what the House of Commons is for. The hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) made the same point extremely eloquently. Constituents ask what the House of Commons is for if it cannot make up its mind on the question of the social chapter. They ask whether we can think of a way of bringing the matter to a decision.

Mr. Milligan: The hon. Gentleman says that amendment No. 27 covers an issue of enormous importance. Can he explain why new clauses 74 and 75 do not cover that same issue, and why what the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) has described as a ticking timebomb appears to have become a ticking mouse?

Mr. Dalyell: My hon. Friend must answer for himself on ticking timebombs. I am extraordinarily cautious about my use of language, but it is not arguable that there is no difference between new clauses 74 and 75 and amendment No. 27. If there is no difference, all we can say is that a great many serious Members of Parliament believe that there is one.

Perhaps all these are the troubles that arise when Ministers want to have Maastricht à la carte. Once they start chopping and changing, they cannot be surprised when they find themselves in such difficulties. The House should be in no doubt that a great many of our constituents understand a vast amount more than some hon. Members this afternoon have given them credit for. They have the gut feeling that there has not been fair play. That is why I hope that there will be some change of attitude towards this subject.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): My hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) has touched on one of the fundamentals of our debate today. We are talking about the functions of the chairmanship of Standing Committees and of Committees of the whole House, and in particular we are discussing discretion.

Madam Speaker has been telling us that the debate is about the discretion of the Chair. The hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) has let his views be known, allbeit rather loudly; the views expressed by his colleague, the hon. Member for Northampton, South (Mr. Morris), have been delivered with characteristic courtesy and patience throughout this difficult Committee stage.

It has not been denied even by the Chairman of the Procedure Committee that if confidence in the Chair is to be sustained, and if our procedures are to inspire confidence in the country, there must be an opportunity for debates of this sort when an important matter about which there are strong feelings arises. I therefore reject the accusations by the right hon. Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King), who said a couple of days ago, as did the Chairman of the Procedure Committee, that there was something improper about holding such a debate. I suggest that, because of the issues involved, this debate is quite proper.

The essence of parliamentary debate is the opportunity it affords to ventilate an issue. That is what we are doing now. It is what the Standing Orders allow for. We also, however, operate on the basis of a Question. When a motion is proposed, having been selected by the Chair, we have a debate. There is evidence today that the debate under discussion, in which amendment No. 27 was the main feature, exercised the House, and there were strong reasons why there should have been a vote. My hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow has pointed out that the public expect, as is their right, that if a matter of great importance is debated, it should be brought to a conclusion by a decision.

The Chair has a problem because of the link between the Bill and the treaty. In certain respects something that wrecks a Bill may not be selectable or, if it is, it may not be put to the vote. That is for the discretion of the Chair. We are concerned not with the Bill but with the treaty. We have to decide whether the House will provide the Government with sufficient power to ratify the treaty. Therefore, something which may be within the compass of the Bill, because it restricts what can be done, may wreck the treaty. That is a matter for the House and it is not a question on which the Chair should exercise discretion, as would happen in a Standing Committee. In Standing Committees we deal with domestic legislation, which is reversible, and which may be changed by a different Government.

Some people want the European Communities (Amendment) Bill to be irreversible in regard to citizenship of the United Kingdom, a matter of momentous importance. Therefore, democracy and the procedure of the House must be seen to work. It is the same with justice which must not only be done but must be seen to be done. The confidence of the population in our procedures must be maintained; we must demonstrate that our procedure is above board.

Mr. Salmond: The hon. Gentleman's views are held sincerely. When new clauses 74 and 75 came into play, the Chairman of Ways and Means had to make a choice. While we may not agree with the choice, nevertheless it was his choice. We can hardly blame him for making his choice, nor can the hon. Gentleman, given that new clauses 74 and 75 were tabled by members of his party.

Mr. Spearing: Let us go through it carefully. The Chairman had a choice. As matters developed, I suppose we can say that the range of that choice varied. I do not think that any of us would have liked to have been in that position. The point is that when the choice was made, it was exclusive and not inclusive. Something which was reckoned to be a strong possibility—I put it no higher—was excluded. People were disappointed. I will not use the word, like my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), but some people, very distinguished people, reflected a view and said that they were cheated. If people feel like that because a discretionary choice involved exclusion rather than inclusion, we must question the use of that discretion.

I expect it has happened to other people too, but I was moved out of the Chair on one occasion, about 30 years ago. I hasten to add that it was not in respect of any function in the House. The feeling about it was strong and was of great personal concern to me at the time. The incident arose from a ruling which I made when in the chair at a meeting of a voluntary organisation. There was no question of a motion of mild comment or even criticism, which would cover the motion before the House. I was moved out of the chair forthwith because my friends disagreed with a vital ruling which I had made. The matter was resolved, but when I spoke to them afterwards I began to see their point of view. I realised that they had every right to propose a motion to remove me from the chair.

I would not agree with it happening here perhaps more than once every 20 years. It should not be done without good reason. Having been Chairman of a Select Committee for nine years, I know the problems. There must be an opportunity for people to ventilate their concern. We are doing so now in a proper, democratic way. If we could not do so, the power of discretion which we put in the charge of any Chair could become wider and other Chairmen might not know that at any time their decisions were under scrutiny. If decisions were not under scrutiny, the power of the Chair would not be exercised with proper caution. Indeed, after a time the power of the Chair would be diminished.

The Chair is a servant of the House. My hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) mentioned Speaker Lenthall. The Chair is a servant of the corporate Committee or of the House, to do what the House wishes. The House wishes its procedures to be beyond reproach so that hon. Members who wish to vote on a motion, having debated it, may do so. Anything which stops that happening raises a question and will be viewed, in the words of my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow, as a bit of a swizz. That might be an understatement in respect of the possible consequences of amendment No. 27.

You have listened to most of the debate, Madam Speaker. Report stage is there for a purpose: the Speaker can take an overall view of all the circumstances and is not bound by some of the precedents which are properly adhered to by the Chair of Committees. Whatever we decide now, there will be a Report stage. A matter of major controversy was selected for debate, and was debated. I ask you, Madam Speaker, in your capacity as a servant of the House and, through that, as a servant of the people whom we represent and who expect us not only to debate but to reach a decision, to bear in mind in your judgment all the matters raised in the debate.

Mr. Timothy Wood (Lords Commissioner to the Treasury) rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Question put, That the Question be now put:—

Orders of the Day

European Communities (Amendment) Bill

Considered in Committee [Progress, 19 April]

[MR. MICHAEL MORRIS in the Chair]

Order read for resuming adjourned debate on Question [19 April], That the clause (Entry into force) be read a Second time:

'This Act shall come into force on a day appointed by the Secretary of State by order in a statutory instrument.'.
—[Mr. Shore.]

Question again proposed.

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Michael Morris) rose——

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

The Chairman: Before I call the first speaker, I have a short announcement to make.

In the circumstances, I think that it would be for the convenience of hon. Members generally if I were to say now that I am prepared, after the Division on new clause 8, to select for a separate Division new clause 49, in the name of the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould).

I remind the Committee that in this debate we are also considering the following:

New clause 46—Ascertainment of national opinion (No. 2)—

'(1) Immediately after the passing of this Act the Secretary of State shall lay before Parliament the draft of an Order in Council making such provision as Her Majesty thinks appropriate for ascertaining, by means of a confirmatory referendum or otherwise, the preponderance of national opinion with respect to the commencement of this Act.

(2) If a draft laid before Parliament under this section is approved by a Resolution of each House, Her Majesty in Council may make an Order in the terms of the draft; provided that the Order shall not be made unless separate provision has been made by Parliament for defraying out of public funds any expenses to be incurred by a Minister of the Crown or Government Department in carrying the Order into effect.'.

Amendment (a) to new clause 46, in subsection (1), at end insert

'and also the incorporation or otherwise of the United Kingdom into the Agreement annexed to the Protocol on Social Policy.'.

New clause 48—Commencement (Opinion of the House)—

'This Act shall not come into force until the House of Commons has expressed a view on the desirability of a referendum in each component nation of the United Kingdom with respect to the commencement of this Act.'.

Amendment (a) to new clause 48, at end add

'and on whether such referenda should consult on the incorporation or otherwise of the United Kingdom into the Agreement annexed to the Protocol on Social Policy.'.

New clause 49—Commencement provisions—

'This Act shall take effect on the first day of January 1996 or on such earlier date as may be specified in any subsequent Act of Parliament as the date for the holding of a consultative referendum to establish whether or not majority opinion supports The Treaty on European Union.'.

Amendment (a) to new clause 49, at end add

'and also the incorporation or otherwise of the United Kingdom into the Agreement annexed to the Protocol on Social Policy.'.

New clause 50—Referendum Motion—

'Within three months of the passing of this Act, the Secretary of State shall place a motion before Parliament which will provide the opportunity for members of both Houses to express a view on the desirability or otherwise of seeking the views of the electors of the United Kingdom on the merits of the decision taken by Parliament in relation to the Act.'.

Amendment (a) to new clause 50, at end add

'and also on the insorporation or otherwise of the United Kingdom into the Agreement annexed to the Protocol on Social Policy.'.

New clause 53—Transfer of powers—

'No power transferred by this Act from the United Kingdom to European institutions shall be so transferred unless and until the House of Commons has had an opportunity to assess whether it is expedient to measure, and if so by what means, the degree of support within the United Kingdom.'.

Amendment (a) to new clause 53, at end add

'for the Treaty on European Union and also for the incorporation or otherwise of the United Kingdom into the Agreement annexed to the Protocol on Social Policy.'.

7.26 pm

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills): The association between new clauses 8 and 46 is important because, without it, the result would not be as effective as new clause 46 by itself. I note that new clause 46 is headed "Ascertainment of national opinion". I suggest that the better heading would be "Trust the people".

In discussing a new constitutional arrangement—there have been difficulties for the Chair and for some hon. Members—we have been addressing substantial constitutional changes that lie behind a two-clause Bill. In doing so, the intention or purpose of the Maastricht treaty has not been clear to everyone in the United Kingdom. As a result, the nation as a whole has suffered.

The Government, those on the Opposition Front Bench and the Liberal Democrats have not over-exercised themselves in trying to explain in detail what is sought through the Maastricht treaty. A continuing theme of the electorate generally is to ask what Maastricht is all about —"Why are you going on about it? What is the fuss? What is going on?". Over the many days in Committee, we have tried patiently to unpick arguments and to demonstrate —this has been done by hon. Members on both sides of the House—that it is proposed that there should be a significant change in the balance of our constitution.

At 50 years of age, I feel old-fashioned when I talk about old verities. Before I became a Member of the House of Commons, it was unthinkable to me that we would be arguing about a transference from democratic government to new arrangements. That is why passion, anger, apprehension and fear are felt by many right hon. and hon. Members and by many other people throughout the country.

Our constitution is founded on the democratic principle, which is government of the people, by the people, for the people, but that is not the system envisaged under the Maastricht treaty. It is, in fact, a system almost of "arrangements", whereby we transfer decisions over whole areas of life—areas that have been subject to the decisions of the House and have been absolute in that term, subject to such time as we wish to repeal or reform them.

7.30 pm

As has been pointed out by the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) and my hon. Friends the Members for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) and for Stafford (Mr. Cash), the Bill demonstrates that the British Government are proposing that the British people enter a new political state. It is as simple as that. They give no reasons as to why this is absolutely essential. They indicate that it is in the national interest, but will not give details.

It has always been open to the Government to issue a White Paper. In the 1970s, a White Paper was issued, reassuring Members of Parliament and the country at large that the absolute principle within our conventions of ministerial accountability would remain in place and that ultimately a British Minister could exercise a veto.

Maastricht has no truck with any of that nonsense. The old verity of democratic control—whereby the people, when they voted, could change Governments and thereby change laws—is lost in large measure under the provisions of the Bill.

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Douglas Hurd): Is not my hon. Friend making a critique of the European Communities Act 1972? Was it not in that Act, whereby we joined the Community, that the system of Community law—which is really what he is attacking—was instituted, approved by the House and subsequently approved by a referendum? Rather than the modifications in the Single European Act or the treaty of Maastricht, is it not that step, 20 years ago, which produced the situation that he is now attacking?

Mr. Shepherd: My right hon. Friend has made what I consider a very valid point. When I was a man of 30 and these arguments were put, I did not realise the significance of a new system of law to which the British system of law became subordinate. That did not come out to me, as an elector, during the debates. That was profoundly important. I have come to recognise the difficulties that all persons, whether of good will to these arrangements or not, have subsequently had to face as it has progressively moved on in what I think a right hon. Friend of ours called the ratchet effect, after leaving the Front Bench.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): My hon. Friend will recollect that between 1972 and 1975, when the referendum was held, we were told that we would be retaining the right of the veto and that that would put our Government and Ministers in a strong position; that we would never have things forced upon us. The debate that took place at that time was largely on a false prospectus, because we did not go into the details adequately—except those of us campaigning the other way. We were not listened to; we were told we were wrong. Subsequently, we have been shown to be right.

Mr. Shepherd: My hon. Friend was wiser than I. I now absolutely agree with what my hon. Friend says. Like the general public at large, I could not weigh things fully then, and I voted in the referendum for the renegotiated terms of our membership. It was a judgment that I had to make because I believed in the arguments. I remember well that the basic argument that was predicted was that it was in our economic interests. The "cold bath"—I think it was called—of Europe would revitalise our fogged-up and fuggy processes, and the dynamism of the new competitive impetus would bring us into a new era of Elysian fields and perpetual harmony.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Southend East): Does my hon. Friend accept that when those in the "no" campaign were putting forward the accurate, clear and precise words now said by the Foreign Secretary, we were told that we were deliberately misleading the public and causing unnecessary trouble? Does he further accept that if the clear, precise and truthful words said by the Foreign Secretary had been said during the 1972 referendum, people might well have voted no, as they should have?

Mr. Shepherd: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend now. As life goes on, of course, we make different judgments as further and better particulars, experience and our own wisdom improve.

We started with a system of democratic accountable government. However imperfect it was—however much we made fools of ourselves in the eyes of the public—there was, nevertheless, a basic trust that if the people voted and expressed a view, it affected the laws and government of our country. That is—or was—fundamental to our system of government.

Mr. Stephen Milligan (Eastleigh): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Shepherd: No, I want to develop my argument.

Between that period and today, we have been confronted with what effectively, behind a two-clause Bill, is the outline of a new constitution. That constitution proposes that the whole range of issues that we discuss, whether they be education, transport systems or—most important to someone like myself—citizenship, are to be secured by two clauses, and we may not change the substance of that constitution. I can think of no arrangement in the development of a free and democratic world—certainly within the English-speaking traditions—whereby two Front Benches willingly accept the concept that we may dismiss the democratic argument.

That is why I call it the old verity. I feel old fashioned, standing here and trying to propose a new clause called "Ascertainment of national opinion"—what I would call "Trust the people." We cannot doubt that transferring control over economic and monetary policies to an unelected central bank somewhere else means that the institution of government becomes a Council of Ministers, meeting in secret, to pass laws on these matters at the sole suggestion of the centralising bureaucracy—the single institutional framework, as it is called—that permeates the new arrangements.

We should use the old tests of democracy—"How do I change the law?" That is a simple question which we have taken for granted over the years. It is so evident and so obvious—you change your Member of Parliament or convince him by argument. Ultimately, if your Member of Parliament is unsympathetic to your argument, you campaign, argue and reason as part of a democratic debate, which has an outcome in the laws under which you live.

Our rule of law has that as its essential trust: it expects obedience. We in the House all expect obedience to the law, and we can demand it on the basis that there is a proper democratic route by which we can change the law. It may be Anglo-Saxon, English, Scottish or Northern Irish—it may be peculiar to our own islands—but, within the English-speaking world, it is the very basis of our understanding of democracy.

That is at issue here. The debates on the Bill have, if they have done nothing else, demonstrated very clearly the framework of the new constitutional arrangements. I can think of no system of democratic government on earth that would take away the rights of ordinary people, without explanation, and ultimately without regard to their view in the matter.

That is the purpose behind the new clause—to return the question to our own fellow electors. None of us is different from them. We have the privilege to represent them, but the powers that we exercise are their powers. I am now a low Tory—I have had the benefit of high Toryism—but this is a people's democracy. This is our Parliament, which will determine the framework of our lives.

I listened very carefully to what was said at our party conference. There is a greater national interest. The national interest, no less, is invoked but there is no explanation of why that national interest should do away with the democratic traditions in this country secured over two or three centuries. The long, slow march of Everyman is set aside in a single Act of Parliament which is intended to be irrevocable and irreversible.

In those very phrases, we contradict the conventions of which we were so proud. We were always deemed not to need a written constitution in the United Kingdom because we were secure in who we were, and in our conventions and arrangements. Dicey, Jennings, and every constitutional writer that we have had, asserted them. Indeed, in a half-hearted way, what I now think of as a miserable tome, "Erskine May", records that. It records the moving away from democratic government. We feel the diffidence within the House now that we feel that there are so many things we can no longer challenge. That is reflected in the diffidence of hon. Members. There are so many things that we feel we cannot challenge. Gosh, what poor imitations we are of our forebears. But we are the inheritors of a great system. Therefore, my old verity—the verity on which most of us were elected to this House—ought to be proclaimed and shouted for.

If we are to give away democratic government, we must be able to put that argument clearly to the people. That may well happen, with megaphones in Downing street, megaphones upstairs in Committee and Front Benchers getting an overbearing voice into the ear of the public. But never doubt—out there is the drip, drip, drip that something ain't right about these arrangements.

When, last Thursday, the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) said that it was a stitch up, he struck a chord with the people. They are deeply dissatisfied with this measure. They are right to be dissatisfied. I have said, from the time of the last election, that I cannot vote for the passing of this measure without the issue being returned to the British people for their decision. I have not heard one word from the party that used to fight for the right to a vote, or from the Treasury Bench, as to why the surrender of democratic, accountable government is right. As historians look at the record of each day's debate, they will find that the most extraordinary feature of this one is that the great, democratic parties of the United Kingdom were unable at any time during the debate to address the question of democratic government. Democracy has gone out of fashion.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Stamford and Spalding): My hon. Friend speaks about the surrender of democracy. I know how strongly he feels on the subject, but does he not recognise that not just this country but the 11 other member states of the Community are deeply attached to the principle of democracy? Is my hon. Friend suggesting that all the people of Europe have been bamboozled by this extraordinary conspiracy to overthrow democracy? Even if he believes that that is credible, is it not slightly perverse of him, if he is concerned about democracy, democratic accountability and the democratic deficit in the Community, to oppose the Maastricht treaty, which incorporates a number of steps to increase democratic accountability? My hon. Friend mentioned that the Council of Ministers meets in secret, but he seems to have forgotten that at the Edinburgh summit it was agreed for the first time that those meetings should now be open. Does he not welcome that fact?

Mr. Shepherd: I have never claimed that I am well schooled, but after remarks like that I feel remarkably well schooled in the traditions and constitution of any country. I am not responsible for how other noble, great countries pursue their own systems of government. However, we have a duty to pay regard to our system of government. I was elected by the people of Aldridge-Brownhills to try to safeguard that with which I was entrusted. If my constituents' right to democratic government is to be taken away, ought they not to be asked about it?

This extraordinary legislation is predicated without a mandate. The ill schooled may suggest that there is a general mandate. As we pointed out at the last election, three parties took for granted the fact that this was to come about. I searched and waited. Where was the appeal from the party leaders—"We must have Maastricht's form of government"? But that is only one route out of many that the Community may take.

The Government now tell us that at the next intergovernmental conference the shape of the new constitution will be refined in our interests, since this one is not satisfactory. The fact is that it is not satisfactory for the whole of Europe. My case, though, is based not on what is satisfactory for the whole of Europe but on what is appropriate for Britain.

There were two copies of the Conservative party manifesto in my constituency. My agent had one; I had the other. It was forwarded, unfortunately, after I had had the opportunity to give guidance to my electorate as to the principles by which I stood. I am told by Conservative central office that between 120,000 and 130,000 copies of the manifesto were published. I imagine that, somewhere, there is a warehouse in which they are gathering dust, awaiting the wonderful day when my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford will be able to auction them off as a lot of great constitutional significance. All that the Conservative party manifesto said about Maastricht was, "Haven't the Government done well to negotiate the Maastricht agreement?"

I have no idea what the Labour party manifesto said, because it did not seem to penetrate Aldridge-Brownhills. Some of my constituents were, no doubt, blessed with gaining possession of the Labour party's central doctrine on Maastricht. Conservative central office also advised us by means of a little leaflet—a quick guide to what the Conservative party stood for. There were many more copies of that leaflet. In fact, we used it as an election leaflet. We scoured it for the new form of constitution that the Government invest so much faith in. They did not discuss it during the general election campaign, but they have troubled the House of Commons with it for nearly 15 months.

Let us consider the sequence. The Maastricht treaty was never available to the House of Commons. It fluttered in —the Minister of State claimed with pride some responsibility, and rightly so, for this—through the window of the Library. There were mimeographed copies of the treaty, but it was incomprehensible and difficult to read. A few Members were troubled by it, but the Government's arguments centred on what would be excluded from discussion. They secured two exclusions, but it is unsatisfactory to approach a constitutional issue in that way.

We had a debate last November in which I spoke on that matter. Although both the Treasury Bench and the Opposition Bench should have taken it on board, not one word was said about democracy. That is shameful. We ought to have greater regard for that which justifies our presence here.

7.45 pm

Mr. John Gorst (Hendon, North): The way that my hon. Friend talks suggests that he believes that British democracy for British people can be performed only in a theatre called the House of Commons or the Palace of Westminster. Let us substitute for the word "democracy" the word "Shakespeare". If, instead of taking the view that Shakespeare can be performed only in British theatres, we took Shakespeare and democracy for the British people abroad and tried to make it work in a much larger entity, as well as trying to make it work in specific ways here, would that not be much better? Is my hon. Friend not taking far too narrow a view of the issue?

Mr. Shepherd: I am not sure what my hon. Friend is driving at. I am here by virtue of the fact of my citizenship. I am British. I was born in Scotland and represent a west midlands constituency. I have to look to those who are my ain folk, if I may use that term. I have to consider what are the best ways in which we can form a system of government. I can think of no finer and more civilised form of government that reflects the will of the people than democratic self-government through our institutions. We are capable of corrupting them, as these measures have demonstrated. We corrupt them by our lack of candour about them.

We are told that Maastricht represents a great gain. The national interest, no less, is the argument. We are told to pander to the people and tell them why their freedoms, rights and long-secured traditions, attitudes and ways of looking at life, formed within our hearts in this common society, must pass away and that they must be ruled by a Council of Ministers, still meeting in secrecy, apart from a few televised illustrations of what could come about, and by a bureaucracy under Mr. Delors—unelected, but acting as though he were the prime minister of a great state, no less—who wants to be the President of the Commission.

The treaty seeks to make us citizens of somewhere else. Slowly, the Government—or Ministers, including the Leader of the House, the Home Secretary and the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry—have come, to their surprise, to understand that the treaty makes the Queen a citizen of Europe. I make that point to demonstrate a profound shift in the concept of Queen and Parliament. I know that this idea is not well explained in our schools. The Secretary of State for Education should perhaps consider the introduction of a course on British democracy. That might demonstrate that we have something to be proud of and that there courses through our bones the means of control over our state.

The central thrust is that we have a constitution. I am being asked to be a citizen by Act of Parliament on a matter of the most profound sentiment, but without any reference to me. How do I feel? How does any British person outside the House feel when he is told that he is now a citizen of a new political organisation in which the United Kingdom is a subordinate constituent and in which the European Court of Justice is the supreme court which will interpret the laws outside our traditions and courts?

Sir Terence Higgins (Worthing): My hon. Friend is speaking as if the referendum is the traditional form of British parliamentary democracy. The reality is that it is our representative system of democracy which forms the basis of this place, and it is the referendum which will corrupt that system. Has not my hon. Friend learnt from his mistake last time when he voted in a referendum which effectively set in concrete the arrangements made at that time and which made it far more difficult for any subsequent changes to be introduced?

Mr. Shepherd: I am slightly surprised by what my right hon. Friend says about the concept of the referendum. I am grateful that my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary is here. The then Prime Minister, Edward Heath, said that these things would be achieved with the full-hearted consent of the British people and Parliament. It is a language which one does not usually associate with my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath) and, as often as not, it is attributed to the Foreign Secretary. Even in those words, there is a profound understanding that, to secure the changes, one requires the whole-hearted consent not only of Parliament but of the British people. That theme has run through the history of the Conservative party in the 20th century.

I put on the record the Conservative party's constitutional amendment of 1911 moved by A. J. Balfour.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): My hon. Friend and I have often discussed this question. He and my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Sir T. Higgins) put their arguments in almost continental terms of great principles, but our unwritten constitution has muddled its way forward not by the exposition of great abstract principles such as they suggest but by ordinary people saying in a muddling way that something is not quite right. They do not understand why it is not quite right, but they know that something should be done.

Surely one of the strongest cases for the referendum is based not on abstract principles as to whether, on the whole, we are in favour of a referendum or not—on the whole, I am much against referendums—but on the fact that something is not quite right about the extremely authoritarian way in which the Government have dealt with their supporters. They have encouraged constituency supporters to attack sitting Members of Parliament in a way which is deeply antipathetic to the traditions of the Tory party. There is also something not quite right about the disgraceful way in which the Government have dealt with the House.

It is because there is something not quite right that those of us who think not in terms of great principles but in pragmatic and Tory terms come to the reluctant conclusion that the only way in which the Government's disgraceful behaviour can be rectified is by dealing with it through the otherwise rather unattractive mechanism of a referendum.

Mr. Shepherd: I always enjoy the interventions of my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen). I have no doubt that his course has been to protect the interests of the citizens of Wolverhampton so that they may vote on every matter with authority, and that the preservation of that principle has been central to his arguments.

Balfour ended his speech of 8 May 1911 on his constitutional amendment with these words:

"I am quite convinced the more this proposal is talked of in this House and the country the more it will receive support. There are difficulties in its application . . . but still in the Referendum lies our one hope of getting the sort of constitutional security which every other country but our own enjoys . . . I further believe, so far from its demoralising, that it would be a great practical education in politics. How many elections are now fought on purely personal grounds. How many . . . give their vote blue or yellow because they have always voted so, or because their fathers voted so. How often a man is content to say, 'I stick to my party, I am loyal to the principles I always professed' or, like a Scotch voter . . . who said, 'Tariff Reform is an excellent policy, and as soon as the Liberals bring it in, I will vote for it most heartily'"— gone are those days.

"How many elections are decided by sentiments of that kind, and very respectable sentiments they are, too. I really think to have a controversy thrashed out in the House and then in the Second Chamber, and then refer it to the electors . . . not on the merits of either . . . the Government or the party, but on the merits of the Bill itself, that that, so far from currupting the sources of democratic life, would only be a great education for political people . . . I am convinced whatever is done now that the controversy that has been started on this great method of constitutional reform must and will bear fruit, and that before long, and practically in the lifetime of all of us, we may see this great democratic engine brought into practice."—[Official Report, 8 May 1911; Vol. XXV, c. 935.]

It took many years and my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup to introduce a referendum to the United Kingdom in the form of border polls in Northern Ireland. In that principle was the recognition that for great constitutional change one had to ask the people and that, as it was a continuing question, it should be repeated each time. We are long overdue in putting another question to the electors of Northern Ireland, but the principle has fed through Conservative politics all the years of this century.

The only example I can find of a Prime Minister who has not served in a Cabinet that has recommended a referendum or has not recommended a referendum himself is the present Prime Minister. All other leaders of our party in this century have either served in Cabinets that recommended a referendum at some time or have themselves recommended it.

Mr. Hurd: Is not my hon. Friend being a little economic with history? He might not recall—but my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) will—that the principle was last discusssed in the House in relation to Europe in 1975, before my hon. Friend's recent Bill. These arguments were deployed at a time, I would argue, when the case for a referendum was strongest because it was then, or a couple of years before, that the House had accepted the principle of Community law, the relationship between the House and the institutions of the Community and the jurisdiction of the European Court. The things about which my hon. Friend is most disturbed were accepted then.

[Mr. Hurd]

Two or three years later, the question arose whether there should be a referendum. The Conservative party, in opposition, had to make up its mind. On that occasion, the speech of the Leader of the Opposition—Baroness Thatcher—dealt with the questions of principle but homed in on the conclusion drawn by my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Sir T. Higgins) that the old-fashioned verities of which my hon. Friend speaks were reflected in the principle of representative democracy and that we owed our constituents not only our industry but our judgment. That was what we were for. On that basis, my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West, I and many others—relatively new Members—went into the House behind our leader precisely on that point of principle to vote for representative democracy and against a referendum.

Mr. Shepherd: That may be so. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary will remember that, towards the end of her speech, the then Leader of the Opposition also accepted the principle that there could be referendums at some future stage when profound matters were in question. It is true that at that time the Conservative party voted against the referendum, but there is no great consistency, because in 1972 the party voted for a referendum when in government. I was merely trying to point out that this is not such a vexed question of representative government that we diminish Parliament; I would argue that we reinforce it. I take the Balfour view and that of all our political leaders, even Winston Churchill.

I see that some of my hon. Friends now cite Attlee's response to Churchill's request for a continuation of the wartime coalition against Japan by the device of a referendum. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary will perhaps recall—from his reading, as he is too young to recall it in any other way—that Attlee said then that referendums were the devices of dictators and demagogues. Indeed, one can understand why he might say that, having lived through the Europe of the 1930s, in which the Hitlers, the Mussolinis and the Francos of this world used the referendum as an instrument for just such purposes. I understand the diffidence within the usual and traditional British political culture, and the reasons why one would be wary.

However, the fundamental question is whether there are any issues that should be returned to the electorate. Dicey would have said, as he ultimately did——

8 pm

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Shepherd: I am trying to talk about some rather important matters, and I want to develop my argument.

Are there any questions that should be returned to the electorate? I, and many other hon. Members, contend that the Bill is such an issue because the treaty purports to be "irrevocable" and "irreversible". Those words are used in the treaty, and that concept goes much against the political culture and tradition that my right hon. Friend identified.

My right hon. Friend could say that such matters have already been disposed of, but I find it difficult to present to the British nation as a whole the facts that there is a range of laws, that there is an independent central bank elsewhere issuing currency, and that, despite all our experience, there is a drive towards the reinstatement of the exchange rate mechanism in stage 2. It is a moot point. We have legal judgment on my side of the argument; the Government advance their own legal judgment, and the matter will be determined ultimately by the Commission and the European Court.

Mr. Marlow: Should my hon. Friend's answer to the Foreign Secretary not be as follows? Our right hon. Friend is saying that we are a representative democracy. We are a representative democracy—just. But if the Bill goes through we shall not be one, so we want a referendum before we cease to be a representative democracy.

Mr. Shepherd: Of course I agree with that; otherwise I should not be proposing a referendum.

Mr. Gorst: Does my hon. Friend not recognise that, certainly in recent years, referendums have been called in aid when Governments have been in difficulties, and have been requested when those who are calling for them are losing the argument?

Mr. Shepherd: That observation is often made, and there is some truth in it. We know full well that the referendum of the mid-1970s, which I thought wholly right and appropriate, came about because of the difficulties within the party then in government. However, the motive by which one arrives at a conclusion does not mean that the conclusion itself is wrong. The Government were wholly right to hold a referendum because they had to invite the British public——

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): May I comment on what was said by the hon. Member for Hendon, North (Mr. Gorst)? He cannot possibly be correct, because the case for the referendum will be made this evening both by people who are against Maastricht, such as the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd), and by people who are for Maastricht, such as myself. We cannot both be losing the argument.

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): Although masses of things can be done within a parliamentary democracy, is not the principle that there is one thing that a parliamentary democracy cannot do, and that is to give up its operation of parliamentary democracy? If that is to be done, some other method must be used to ratify the decision. Normally, such decisions could do no more than pass things over to another parliamentary democracy, but that is not happening with Maastricht, because things are being passed over to a bureaucracy. Nevertheless, the reason for a referendum is based on the principles of representative government and parliamentary democracy.

Mr. Shepherd: I absolutely agree. The difficulty for our argument has been that the people outside did not have the benefit of reading the treaty. We must remember that it was not published until a week before Second Reading, so all the new hon. Members who entered the House did not have the opportunity to reflect on the contentions of the treaty during the general election. If their electorate had asked them what it was about, they would have been unable to say.

Mr. Budgen: I hope that my hon. Friend will deal with what the Foreign Secretary said about Burke's great speech setting out our duties. When Burke made that speech, it was true that a Member of Parliament often had a difficult time with his patron, but not necessarily with his party. Now we have the tyranny of the party, which has prevented Members of Parliament from expressing their views on the treaty freely. There can be little doubt that there would not be a free majority for the Maastricht treaty on the Government side if it were not for the operation of the party machine.

Mr. Shepherd: I accept the argument, but I notice that the House has provided a wonderful forum for my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West to express his views courageously and clearly. What he has said today gives a cheer for our democracy, but to speak in that way requires more courage than it did in the past, when the sentiment of the people was so clearly that they expected their Member of Parliament to be able to express freely, courageously, loudly and boldly his views on matters that affected their lives and well-being. I also reflect that Burke lost the election after having written that letter. I believe that if any of us sent such a letter to our constituents today he would probably lose the election, too.

Mr. Peter Luff (Worcester): I respect the integrity and sincerity of my hon. Friend's belief that the issue before us is the single most important issue facing the country, and therefore deserves a referendum. However, in my constituency a referendum is already being conducted. There are six questions, not one, on the ballot paper. The first is indeed about Maastricht; another is about the principle of a referendum; another is about a freedom of information Bill. There is also a question about the use of urban rather than rural land for development, and the last two are about live animal transport and hunting with hounds. I have to tell my hon. Friend that the person organising the referendum believes that the last of those six questions is the single most important issue confronting the people of this country, and that is why the referendum is being organised. Does my hon. Friend not accept that he is letting a dangerous genie out of the bottle by proposing a referendum?

Mr. Shepherd: Clearly my hon. Friend must pursue his own arguments with his own electorate, but I find it deeply disturbing if someone says that the power of the vote is something trivial, and that its passing away is of no consequence. The heart of the matter is that we are trying to take away irrevocably and irreversibly the traditional strengths that our democratic constitution has had.

In terms of exposition, a referendum is one of the best ways of informing an electorate about the issues in contention. I have always argued that on the most profound political questions—that is, constitutional questions—I believe, as A. J. Balfour did, that the device of the referendum should be available to our people. It would take the party struggle out of the issue. My hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Luff) could then truthfully pursue his argument and I could pursue mine. As my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West has said, there would be no fear of the Whips. This is a matter for the people out there. They would be asked, "Do you or do you not want the constitutional arrangements that follow from Maastricht?"

The people know that there is something corrupt in all this. It cannot be right that their rights are being taken away without a reference back to them. Certainly it is wrong for that to happen without its having been a major issue in an election. We used to have the principle of what was called the specific mandate. From time to time during our history, there has been an election in which there has been such fury over a single issue that no one has had any doubt about the will of the people as expressed in the outcome. That has not happened in recent years, and certainly no one could call 1992 an election with a specific mandate on the concept of Maastricht. Yet the Front-Bench Members on both sides of the House implicitly accept that the 1992 election conferred the right to change the constitution so profoundly. I hope that the Labour party will see that there is an advantage in returning the question to the country.

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher): It increasingly appears that the difference between us is an assessment of how best to look after the interests of our constituents, given that the decision to enter the Community, with all the institutional implications, was made back in the 1970s. The effect of the Maastricht treaty is to redefine some of the commitments that we as a country made a considerable time ago, when we accepted that, because sovereignty was not like virginity, which one either has or does not have, but was a multi-layered concept, looking after the interests of our constituents often meant that we as Members of Parliament could have more influence by working together within the Community institutions, by looking after the Executive in this place, which represented us in those institutions, and by occasionally working with the European Parliament, rather than by attempting to ignore everything else and saying that only what happened in this place could protect the interests of our constituents.

In my view, Maastricht does not mark a fundamental departure. It marks a continuation of what we set out to do. Indeed, it provides various means of strengthening the process.

Mr. Shepherd: That is the conveyor-belt argument and I look forward to challenging my hon. Friend in the referendum campaigns around the country. We should trust the people. Let them decide the difference between the two arguments. At the end of the day, that is all I am saying. We are talking about powers that we are moving. They are not my powers or the powers of the House. This House is the symbol of the sovereignty of the people.

Because of the constitutional concepts, the idea of the sovereignty of Parliament has been able to embrace monarchical government, oligarchical government and very limited government, but in the age of democratic government we try to use our Parliament as the instrument to safeguard that democratic quality. It has been the instrument by which we have overcome monarchical, oligarchical and other forms of government.

Many hon. Members will claim that we did not have democracy in Britain until we had the enfranchisement of women and, therefore, we did not have true parliamentary democracy until the late 1920s. However, we are now suggesting that those who have the vote and who send us here will be diminished by this measure. Of itself, that is enough to send it back and have a referendum. We should trust the people.

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak so early in the debate. At the outset, I must state that I do not support the arguments advanced by the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd). As I listened to his entertaining and passionate speech, I felt that I had been there before and that I had heard those arguments when our country was taken into the European Community in 1972. We were told then that that would be the end of parliamentary democracy and that the position and authority of the House, and of hon. Members in it, would be completely and irrevocably undermined. We were told that those irrevocable steps, as the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills described them, would diminish our ability to represent our constituents and the country effectively.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Cunningham: Not just at the moment.

I have always believed that nothing is irrevocable in a democracy. The nature and purpose of democracy is to facilitate and allow change if the Government of the day win a mandate for change. I do not accept that decisions taken in any democratic country can be categorised as irrevocable.

If the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills thinks about it for a moment, he might realise that what might be irrevocable are circumstances in which we increasingly abdicate the responsibilities of this House by taking more and more decisions by plebiscite. In the long term, that would be the biggest single threat to the authority of Parliament and it would undermine parliamentary democracy in the way that we have always had it. I believe that the argument is the reverse of the way in which the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills presented it to the Committee this evening.

Mr. Cash: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way now?

Dr. Cunningham: No, not just at the moment. I have literally just begun my speech and I do not wish to speak at great length because the situation is quite simple.

During our membership of the Community, which was not originally the subject of a referendum—although as the Foreign Secretary quite candidly said, when we had a referendum it was opposed by the Conservative party in opposition—it has been argued that a referendum would resolve the question once and for all. As the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills quite rightly said, there have been other referendums to settle the question. However, there is no evidence to support that conclusion.

The question of British membership of the Community was not settled by the referendum and the campaign against membership of the Community continues today. We have witnessed a manifestation of that, at least in part, in the nature of our debates and discussions in the Chamber over the past few weeks.

Mr. Cash: The right hon. Gentleman questioned whether an irrevocable change was taking place. Only a few days ago, the right hon. Gentleman voted against amendment No. 225 which related to the "Protocol on the transition to the Third Stage of Economic and Monetary Union" which dealt with the central bank. According to the protocol—and the right hon. Gentleman has voted to sustain this position—

"The high contracting parties,"— including the United Kingdom and its Government whom the right hon. Gentleman is supporting—

"Declare the irreversible character of the Community's movement to the third stage . . . and . . . no Member State shall prevent the entering into the third stage"— and the third stage must start and continue—

"irrevocably on 1 January 1999."

The right hon. Gentleman has just contradicted what he voted for in respect of amendment No. 225.

8.15 pm

Dr. Cunningham: Before we reach that point, there will be another vote in the House of Commons to determine that issue. The suggestion made by the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills, and reinforced by the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash), that that irrevocable decision is being taken now is not borne out by the facts.

My point is that, in my experience, whenever referendums are held, for example, in Northern Ireland, in respect of devolution in Scotland and on membership of the Community, they have never finally decided the issue. Shortly after the outcome of those referendums, the campaigns have continued as before. There is no way of preventing that in a democracy.

If I am fortunate enough to be addressing the House from the Opposition Front Bench in a few years time—or perhaps more fortunate to be addressing the House from the Government Front Bench—I believe that we will still be having these arguments in the House and in the country as a whole. I cannot accept the argument that a referendum will finally allow the people to decide the issue.

Mr. Michael Lord (Suffolk, Central): A few moments ago, the right hon. Gentleman said that the fears of people in 1975, about what would happen as a result of our entering the Common Market, have not been realised. I believe that the right hon. Gentleman represents an agricultural constituency, as I do. He must be aware of the agricultural problems that I have to solve and he will be aware just how impotent my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food is to solve the problems that I, as a Back Bencher, take to him.

Europe has intervened more in our national affairs in respect of agriculture than anywhere else and, as an agriculture Member, I can no longer represent my constituents as I should. With regard to agriculture, the fears expressed in 1975 were entirely justified.

Dr. Cunningham: I do not accept that argument. That is an argument for not being part of the CAP and for not being part of the Community. That makes my point that the argument about membership of the Community was not finally resolved by the referendum in 1975. There will always be people in Britain, be they farmers or industrialists——

Mr. Cash: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster) rose——

Dr. Cunningham: I will not give way at the moment. I must be allowed to deal with one intervention before I give way to another.

As the hon. Member for Suffolk, Central (Mr. Lord) said, there are many farmers in my constituency in perhaps 350 square miles of west and south Cumbria. Some of them support our membership of the Community, some are exasperated by it and some are implacably opposed to it. However, the idea that there is a uniform view about the benefits or disadvantages of membership of the Community for the people in the various agricultural industries does not hold water.

Over the past 20 years, some aspects of agriculture have benefited enormously from aspects of the CAP—perhaps more so than many of us would have wished. However, to suggest that it has all been negative and downhill for British agriculture since we have been in the Community——

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way now?

Dr. Cunningham: Very well, let us get it over with now.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: Does the right hon. Gentleman agree—[Interruption.] He is on this point. I used to represent his area. It was never easy work going to the Minister of Agriculture because one had to go through an iron-fisted Chancellor. It is a jolly sight easier in many ways to argue in Brussels than to argue with the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Dr. Cunningham: I cannot resist the temptation of saying that perhaps an iron-fisted Chancellor would be better than the clay-footed one we have at present. I substantially agree with the hon. Lady's point. She is a constituency neighbour of mine and used to represent my constituents in the European Parliament.

Another aspect of the intervention on agriculture bears some scrutiny. The implication was that, if we had not been in the European Community and had not been subject to some of the—I am prepared to concede—vicissitudes of the common agricultural policy, everything in the garden, perhaps I should say pastures, would have been wonderful for our farmers. I cannot accept that as a legitimate conclusion.

I am not convinced that we should have a referendum because it would finally and irrevocably settle the issue.

Several hon. Members rose——

Dr. Cunningham: No, I shall make a little progress. I am a little confused as to why so many Conservative Members did not raise all these issues when the Single European Bill was before the House. Not only did that Act make some important and far-reaching changes to our circumstances, but Conservative Members who were in the House at the time voted to have it guillotined. To contrast the time allocated for discussion on and deliberation of the intricate details of the Maastricht treaty with the performance of the Conservative party and the Government at that time is instructive because Conservative Members voted not only to have the Single European Act——

Mr. John Townend (Bridlington): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Cunningham: No, I have not yet finished making my point so it is a little unreasonable to ask me to give way on it.

Conservative Members voted to curtail discussion on the Single European Bill. At that time, there were no great campaigns or claims that we were giving away irrevocably the powers of this Parliament, undermining parliamentary democracy as we have always known it or betraying the wishes of the British people. The attitude was that it was hell for leather—let us get it through. That is in stark contrast to the views now being expressed at least by some Conservative Members.

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North): Several Conservative Members in the House at present did not vote for the Single European Act. I continue to be worried about the right hon. Gentleman's use of the word "irrevocable". He said earlier that nothing was irrevocable. Is not that the crux of this debate? In reality, if we give away our sovereignty and effectively put into British law something whereby we are not controlled by the British Parliament but by 11 other countries—and who knows how many other countries there will be as more join the Community—that is irrevocable, even if all the countries agree to change the law. Is not that the crux of the argument? The magnitude of the problem and the magnitude of the subject mean that we are entitled to say that this is a subject on which the British people should have a say.

Dr. Cunningham: I am for the British people having a say in general elections—in assessing how I represent them and how I perform with regard to the interests of the people in my constituency. They have the opportunity to decide whether they want me to continue to represent them. I do not accept that people do not have a say.

At the general election, the Labour party made it clear that it strongly supports membership of the European Community. We made no secret of that. I am prepared to accept that those issues were not pre-eminent in the election campaign in which we all participated last year. Nevertheless, it is wrong to say that people, either as individual candidates or as political parties, did not have an opportunity to raise the issues or question them.

Mr. John Townend: At the general election, what opportunity was there for the members of the electorate who opposed Maastricht when all the major parties were for Maastricht? They had no choice whatever, and that is the main argument for a referendum.

Dr. Cunningham: I do not accept that. The majority of voters drew a conclusion from the fact that all political parties came to the judgment that the best interests of our country lay in being a full-hearted member of the European Community.

Mr. Townend: They had no choice.

Dr. Cunningham: It was the collective view: the hon. Gentleman is right. I think that it was the unanimous view of the political parties. It was also the right view.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): I am listening with great attention. First, my right hon. Friend knows that the Maastricht treaty was negotiated after the 1991 Labour party conference. Therefore, there was no party commitment whatever to Maastricht during our conference. Secondly, the treaty had not been published in English at the time of the general election and, therefore, people not only did not know what it was but were told that——[Interruption.] Of course, they did not know the details. It has taken hours of debate in Committee to bring out the details. The Labour party national executive and the shadow Cabinet came out for the treaty without having any authority from the party conference.

Dr. Cunningham: At least some of that intervention is true: it is a matter of record. If my right hon. Friend's argument is that I have no authority to stand here on behalf of the Labour party and advance these views, he is wrong. In 1992 at the Labour party conference, an overwhelming majority of the national executive committee and the shadow Cabinet voted in favour of the Maastricht process, as did the Trades Union Congress and most of the constituent members of the trade unions. Therefore, I cannot accept that there has been no consultation, deliberation or debate about our view on the merits or otherwise of the Maastricht treaty?

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): There was no consultation.

Dr. Cunningham: I do not accept that: there was widespread consultation within our party and with people in our constituencies—and it has continued ever since.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): How does the right hon. Gentleman explain that, consistently in the past 18 months, public opinion polls and surveys have shown that an overwhelming majority of British people—Conservative voters, Labour voters and others—wished to have a referendum on the Maastricht treaty? The poll that took place in February 1993 showed that 73 per cent. of the people in the United Kingdom wished to have a referendum on the Maastricht treaty and the European Communities (Amendment) Bill.

Dr. Cunningham: I am aware of how public opinion stands and how it fluctuates. In the past, I dare say that there have been occasions when the hon. Gentleman—I do not want to misrepresent his views—has campaigned for matters such as capital punishment on the basis of public opinion. If we had simply taken public opinion as our guiding light, rather than our judgment in such matters, and if capital punishment had been reintroduced——

Several hon. Members rose——

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order.

Dr. Cunningham: If we took note of public opinion at a specific time, all sorts of arguments would be adduced in favour of referendums. I return to my point about the speech by the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills.

8.30 pm

Then we would have referendums on the basis of snapshots of public opinion. If we had acceded to that request, a whole lot of people who have subsequently been found to be wrongly convicted might have been executed as a result of simply giving in to public opinion without further and proper consideration of the issues. So I am not persuaded by that argument.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): My right hon. Friend is correct to say that if capital punishment had existed in Britain people who have been found innocent would already have been executed.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: Lots of people would not have been murdered.

Mr. Winnick: Will the hon. Lady contain herself?

Does my right hon. Friend agree that there is a great distinction to be made between matters, however controversial, which Parliament should decide—whether capital punishment or any other issue—allowing the electorate to decide in the general election whether in its judgment we were right or wrong, and great constitutional issues such as that which we are debating today? Surely the British people should have some say about whether further economic and political power should be transferred from Britain to the European Community. On that issue alone many Opposition Members believe that a referendum would be justified.

Dr. Cunningham: I know my hon. Friend's view. I have just set out my reasons for not accepting his argument. I see no force in what he says to persuade me that the British people have not had the opportunity——

Mr. Budgen: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Teddy Taylor: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Cunningham: I am being fairly generous in taking interventions. I am just beginning to respond to my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) and I have been asked to give way again. Regretfully, I have to say, "Sorry, not for the moment." In response to my hon. Friend—I had better address the Committee, but I feel uncomfortable speaking to him with my back to him—I would say that one thing is absolutely sure: a referendum approved by the House, containing a question tabled by a Conservative Government, would not provide the British people with one of the options that we want them to have. We want them to have the opportunity to vote on whether we should adopt the social chapter.

Furthermore, the best hope that we have of achieving agreement that the social chapter should apply in our country is not to have a referendum but to win a vote, hopefully during the Report stage of these proceedings. That is the best option for achieving the most important political objective that our party has set itself in the debate in the Committee.

Mr. Salmond: If that is the right hon. Gentleman's major difficulty, perhaps he will support our amendment to one of the new clauses on the amendment paper this evening. To reach that new clause we must first pass new clause 49 in the name of his hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould). Is he aware that today the Scottish Trades Union Congress overwhelmingly voted in favour of a referendum on the Maastricht treaty? Does not that show that there has been some change of mind since the conferences last year on which the right hon. Gentleman put so much emphasis?

Dr. Cunningham: I shall deal first with the hon. Gentleman's amendment. I do not know whether it will be put to a Division, but it seems to me that he is offering me something of a false prospectus. He is saying that if only we agree to supporrt the argument for a general referendum, there is a hope—but no certainty—that his amendment will have the support of the same majority. I do not believe that many Conservative Members—I do not wish to malign them—who are strongly in favour of a referendum on whether we should endorse the Maastricht treaty will vote for the inclusion of a question about the social chapter. They see the social chapter as one of the greatest single threats from the European Community to what they regard as the future well-being of Britain.

Mr. Salmond: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Cunningham: No, I have given way once to the hon. Gentleman. I cannot accommodate all the interventions if I give way to the same hon. Gentleman twice in a couple of minutes. He is offering me a false prospectus and I do not have too much difficulty in rejecting it.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Budgen: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Cunningham: I shall give way to the hon. Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor). Then I shall draw my remarks to a conclusion.

Sir Teddy Taylor: The only hopeful thing that has happened in a miserable day is the statement by the right hon. Gentleman that nothing is irrevocable. Will he take some time to explain how the House of Commons could legally turn anything back once the Maastricht treaty was ratified? If he could explain that, it would be one of the most hopeful things to have happened today. Our interpretation is that there is no lawful way in which the Houses of Parliament could go backwards once Maastricht was through.

Dr. Cunningham: The hon. Gentleman has to convince the British people to elect a Government who would repeal or withdraw—[Interruption.] It is not inconceivable, at least in theory, that a Government could be elected who had come to the conclusion that Britain's membership of the Community was no longer in the best interests of the country. That is why I say that in a democracy, by definition, things can be changed as a result of a change in Government. [Interruption.] No Parliament can irrevocably bind its successor. [HON. MEMBERS: "Yes, it can."]

Mr. Iain Duncan-Smith (Chingford): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Cunningham: No. I said that I would give way for the last time to the hon. Member for Southend, East, and then draw my remarks to a conclusion. I must then keep a much delayed engagement before returning to the Committee later in the debate.

Mr. Duncan-Smith: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Cunningham: No. I cannot speak for the Conservative party.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Or for the Labour party.

Dr. Cunningham: I am speaking about decisions taken by the Labour party, about which my hon. Friend apparently feels cavalier. Those decisions were taken overwhelmingly by the national executive committee, the shadow Cabinet and the party conference. That is the position on which I base my remarks to the Committee today. They were properly and constitutionally taken decisions of the party. I do not know how my hon. Friend can say from a sedentary position that I do not speak on behalf of the Labour party. Those decisions are clear and on the record. There is no point in disputing them.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: My right hon. Friend is telling us that the abandonment of powers under the treaty is not irrevocable. He says that another Parliament or Government could take them back. Under the treaty, especially after we have gone into monetary union—it may be a separate decision, but it is a binding one—we shall give over control of interest rates, our central bank, any European central bank, and our exchange rates, levels of borrowing and money supply. What can we take back out of that lot?

Dr. Cunningham: We have had those debates and discussions in the Chamber in the past few weeks. They have been dealt with by my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) and others at some length. I simply do not accept my hon. Friend's long list of assertions.

I have the feeling that this is a debate and vote which we might describe as a Group 4 Security vote. It is a "go as you please" vote. Regardless of the decisions of the party, many of my hon. Friends intend to make up their own mind how to vote. That is a matter for them. But speaking on behalf of my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition and the shadow Cabinet, and in support of the decisions of our party, let me say that we shall vote against the new clause in the Lobby tonight.

Sir Roger Moate (Faversham): It is a bit rich for the right hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) to refer to the way in which my hon. Friends changed their position on the Single European Act. We fully understand that the right hon. Gentleman has to leave but he should understand that the Labour party and its Front-Bench team have turned so many somersaults on the European issue and now they proclaim—to my deep regret—that they are convinced and passionate Europeans. They have opposed virtually every piece of European legislation for the past 25 years.

For the right hon. Member for Copeland, who has just left the Chamber, to attack the principle of a referendum when he voted for one in 1975 is extraordinary. I wish that he had stayed in the Chamber long enough to explain how he could argue so passionately against it today when he voted in favour of it in 1975. He was then a young Member, and no doubt ambitious—it did not get him far, as he is still in opposition. Doubtless the same can be asked of other Members in the Labour Front-Bench team—why are they against a referendum today, when they were for it in 1975? The deputy leader of the Labour party, no less, was the Whip on that occasion, rightly voting in support of a referendum to allow the British people a say.

Mr. Robert Ainsworth (Coventry, North-East): I voted against membership of the Common Market in 1975, and times have moved on considerably since then. However, the question then being asked was different. The European Single Act, which was pushed through the House on a guillotine, gave away some of the powers that Conservative Members are now complaining about. They did nothing about it then.

Mr. Duncan-Smith rose——

Sir Roger Moate: I shall give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Chingford (Mr. Duncan-Smith).

Mr. Duncan-Smith: The right hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham), who has just left the Chamber, made an intriguing statement, which lies at the core of the issue. He said that nothing was irrevocable. There is a good example of why that statement is wrong and why the whole argument about how irrevocable the treaty is, as it binds one Parliament to another. In 1977, under the then Labour Administration, the acquired rights directive, now referred to as the transfer of undertakings, was initiated. Since then, we have had Conservative Administrations, and during that time there have been rulings in the European Court of Justice that have gradually changed the meaning of that directive, so that the present Government have had to introduce legislation to change the directive as it affected our right to decide whether or not certain local councils should have to take on the rights of employees. Will my hon. Friend comment on that?

Sir Roger Moate: My hon. Friend has given a good illustration of creeping irrevocability. We are not necessarily talking about whether something is irrevocable or not, but whether it is intended that it should be for ever. When the original treaty of Rome was signed and when the Maastricht treaty is signed—and those who subscribe to it say that we should move to common defence and foreign policies—the clear, honest and open intention will be to transfer power to another forum on a permanent basis.

The proposition is simple—if Parliament is contemplating such a move, in the unique circumstances of a transfer of power with the intention that it should be irrevocable, Parliament should ask the permission of those that elected its Members. We talk about a sovereign Parliament, but really we mean the sovereignty of the people in Parliament. We in this Parliament have no rights to transfer or to intend to transfer irrevocably those powers to another organisation without gaining the electorate's authority. That is a simple concept, which seems to be gaining acceptance if one considers the precedents to which I shall refer later.

I must tell the hon. Member for Coventry, North-East (Mr. Ainsworth) that it was that motivation that lay behind the Labour Government's introduction of a referendum in 1975. The principle was right then, and I believe that there are overwhelming arguments for it to be adopted again. There is a stronger argument for the Labour party to advocate a referendum than the Conservative party. The Labour party's official position goes far beyond that adopted by the Government. The Labour party advocates the acceptance of a single currency—the ultimate expression of the ambitions of a single state. If that is not an issue that should be put to the British people, I do not know what is.

8.45 pm

I am extremely disappointed that the Government are against a referendum, but it is not surprising, because Governments are seldom in the business of erecting obstacles to their own plans and legislation. It is not surprising that they should reject the idea of volunteering a referendum. President de Gaulle did so and we saw the consequences for him; President Mitterrand did so and he nearly came a cropper. Therefore, it is not surprising that the Government have not voluntarily erected that obstacle.

But whatever the Labour party's views on the issue, I strongly argue that it is the Labour party that is betraying the British people by not sticking to the principle that it espoused in 1975. I shall return to that issue, as it involves a fundamental duty of the Opposition. If the Labour party were espousing the referendum today—which I believe the British people want and demand—there would be an overwhelming coalition for it in the House. It is very much the failure of the Labour party's Front Bench team to endorse a referendum that is depriving the British people of their right to vote on the issue, which is a matter of regret to me.

My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary advanced an argument in an intervention during the speech of my hon. Friend for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd). My hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills quoted precedents. As on other occasions, my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary challenged a referendum as the right constitutional formula. He said that it was not Conservative, and it undermined parliamentary sovereignty.

However, my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary did not challenge the precedent quoted by my hon. Friend, which is of the utmost importance—perhaps he will do so later. That precedent was the introduction of the Northern Ireland border poll by a Conservative Government in the 1970s. That was a firm, cast-iron precedent—it was a referendum introduced by a Conservative Government on a matter involving the future powers and sovereignty of a part of the United Kingdom. However, it was not simply introduced into our constitution; it has become as entrenched a part of our constitution as anything can be.

Every time a Cabinet Minister comes to the Dispatch Box and says that Northern Ireland will remain a part of the United Kingdom until a majority of the people of Northern Ireland decide otherwise, he reaffirms his belief in the principle of a referendum and in the fact that the people of Northern Ireland, whenever it is necessary and required, will have the right to determine their future. I urge my right hon. Friends, whatever their dislike of referendums and whatever their tactical objections, to reconsider the principles that they say underline their case.

Mr. Winnick: Surely the position is unlike that in 1975, when most of the press—the tabloids and the serious press—were in favour of a yes vote, and the Government and the Conservative Opposition and the Liberal party were all urging the electorate to vote yes. Now, is it not true that the two Front-Bench teams do not want a referendum because they cannot assume that they would win? If they thought otherwise and believed that victory was possible, they might be in favour of it. I do not underestimate the position, but the circumstances are different from those in 1975 and I believe that the Front-Bench teams do not want to put the issue to the British people as they fear losing a referendum on it.

Sir Roger Moate: One can advance any motivations. I do not necessarily believe that that is the Government's motivation. Having met enough obstacles to halt the ratification of the treaty, even if they felt inclined to hold a referendum—which they clearly do not—the Government would probably view a referendum as providing more evidence to our European partners of our weakening resolve, and would pose another obstacle to and damage the British position.

Mr. Bill Walker: Did my hon. Friend not notice a common thread running through the argument about a referendum? It is all right to let the people of Northern Ireland have a referendum as they are the Northern Irish, it is all right to let the Scots have a referendum as they are the Scots, but it is not right for the United Kingdom to have a referendum. It is interesting that the Labour party is currently calling for a referendum on constitutional matters affecting Scotland, yet the Bill goes right to the heart of the constitutional rights of the Scottish people as achieved in the 1706 Act of Scottish Parliament which became the 1707 Treaty of Union.

Sir Roger Moate: I agree with my hon. Friend. It is a matter of regret that we are arguing with our own Front Bench and with the Conservative party position. There is a great deal to be gained in our constitutional arrangements by accepting the principle of the referendum on great constitutional issues. It is a matter of regret, because we have begun to accept it in practice, yet we argue against it in principle.

We have had referendums in Scotland, in Wales, in Northern Ireland and in the United Kingdom. That is quite a lot of referendums in a short space of history, yet here we are arguing against the referendum as though it were an alien device that we must resist. It is a simple proposition—this answers an earlier intervention about animal rights.

We are talking about great constitutional issues, and as we do not have a written constitution and a supreme court to refer to, the only ultimate authority that Parliament can have is the people. It is a simple proposition, and we should accept it.

Mr. John Carlisle: Does my hon. Friend agree that the Government understood the gravity and the importance of the subject by granting a paving debate, in the Prime Minister's words, so that the House could express an opinion? It was granted in the summer, but when the debate took place in November, there was heavy whipping —my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-west (Mr. Budgen) was talking about the pressures of it—and the Conservative party made it almost a personal vote of confidence in the Prime Minister. There were all sorts of shenanigans, and there was no way that it was an opportunity for free expression, certainly not among Conservative Members and possibly not among Opposition Members either.

Had that debate been a genuine paving debate, and had hon. Members on both sides of the House been allowed to express the opinions of their constituents and themselves without party whipping, we may not have been in the position we are in today.

Sir Roger Moate: I do not agree with my hon. Friend, because many people feel strongly enough about issues of such profound importance not to accept the ruthless whipping that he described. Nor do I accept that the vote to which he referred had much to do with the Maastricht treaty. It had very little to do with the Maastricht treaty. Ultimately, we are talking not about the whipping system but about the principle of a referendum.

Let me return to the precedents. We have the precedents of Northern Ireland, Wales and Scotland, and we have the 1975 European Community referendum. However, there are other precedents which I would ask my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary to consider, because he and others say constantly that the referendum undermines the principle of parliamentary sovereignity. If that is so, is he saying that the Northern Ireland referendum, the border poll and its permanency in our present constitutional arrangements undermine the authority of this Parliament? If he is not, I hope that he will change his position. Is he saying that other Conservative Prime Ministers in the past who have advocated referendums were also undermining that great Conservative principle?

Sir Philip Goodhart, in his book on referendums, quoted five out of nine Conservative Prime Ministers who had advocated the use of the referendum. It is six out of 10 now that Lady Thatcher has become a staunch advocate of the referendum, so we are doing quite well. Is my right hon. Friend saying that, when Mr. Churchill advocated a referendum for the extension of Parliament or union with France, he was undermining parliamentary democracy? Is he saying that Mr. Balfour and Bonar Law were undermining parliamentary democracy by supporting the use of a referendum?

My right hon. Friend is not arrogant, but it would be arrogant to assume that somehow, in the 1990s, we have become the great defenders of parliamentary democracy and sovereignty against such a distinguished list of Conservative Prime Ministers, including my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath) who introduced such a measure into our constitution in the 1970s.

If the answer is that the referendum has now become an acceptable constitutional arrangement, then there is an overwhelming case now for a vote on a referendum on the Maastricht treaty.

My last point is fundamental. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary said in his first intervention that there was an argument for a referendum in 1975 on the treaty of Rome, as that was when the major decision was taken; but we are now talking about what is in effect a refinement, and I believe that this is the time for such a vote. To pretend that it is a refinement is putting quite a gloss on it.

I accept that, from the perspective of my right hon. Friends the Foreign Secretary and the Prime Minister, the Maastricht treaty might be a refinement; it might be a step away from European union. That is one interpretation, but it is certainly not the interpretation of the Labour party. If, through some mischance—these things do happen—the Opposition were suddenly to be in Whitehall and Downing street, they would be strong advocates of a single currency and would take measures to move towards it, and they would use the Maastricht treaty as a platform.

Whatever our agenda is, and it is a good agenda, none the less the European Commission, Mr. Delors and Mr. Mitterrand have their own agenda. When the Maastricht treaty is ratified, they have every ambition to go on to economic union and the single defence policy. All those things are possible, and we cannot know which will happen.

We do not know whether the Maastricht treaty means a great deal or very little. Many of my hon. Friends are trooping through the Lobby saying, "Why are you worried? It's a dead duck." One of my hon. Friends said to me, "I am voting holding my nose, believing that it will not happen," and he might be right.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (Colchester, North): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Sir Roger Moate: When I have finished this point.

Many European leaders believe Maastricht to be the launching pad for the next stage of European union, leading ultimately to federalism. That is their ambition. The fact that we do not know, it could go one way or the other, does not mean that the British people should not have the right to choose—because one thing is certain: in years to come, if we move in the direction that many of us, and the Government, are resisting, we will be told that we voted for the Maastricht treaty, so we must accept the consequences.

How many people here in the past few months have been asked why, if they do not believe in this treaty, they voted for the Single European Act? They may have been dragooned through the Lobby or persuaded by arguments of party loyalty—quite proper arguments, incidentally—but then their votes have been thrown back at them, just as such arguments would be thrown back at us.

Mr. Jenkin: May I draw my hon. Friend's attention to the fact that our own Government have given no assurances that they will not seek to move to the third stage of monetary union or, in the shorter term, to re-enter the exchange rate mechanism? Their agenda is therefore open to question.

9 pm

Sir Roger Moate: I do not question the Government's agenda on this issue. My hon. Friends will not agree with me, but I believe that the direction set out by the Prime Minister offers us more than any other—certainly more than would be offered by the Labour party Front-Bench spokesmen, with their wholehearted commitment to European union, and more than most of our European partners would offer. Excluding the single currency or opting out of the commitment excluding the social chapter, and being determined to expand and enlarge the Community—all these moves offer a proper way forward. We do not know, however, whether the Government will have the power, faced with a great number of other forces, to deliver these objectives. I do know that the Maastricht treaty, good, bad, or indifferent, is a major treaty and is perceived as such by the people of this country.

The intention behind the treaty is expressed in its terrifying preamble, which sets out the ambitions of the federalists. Those ambitions have been nurtured for 30 years; they will not go away just because of the recession in Europe—they will reassert themselves. That is why we need a referendum. The Labour party could have helped us to deliver one, but it will not. So probably we will not get one, even though I will vote for it. Perhaps the House of Lords will, too.

If there is an argument for a referendum on the Maastricht treaty, there will be an even more powerful argument for a referendum on the single currency, because that would be the ultimate and irrevocable step that would take Britain into a federal united states of Europe. That federalist ambition still exists. I am disappointed that the Government have not perceived that this was an opportunity to get the endorsement of the British people for their decision, one way or the other. That would have been to their credit. It would have helped this Parliament politically, and above all it would have been right.

Mr. Bryan Gould (Dagenham): I am glad that new clause 49 has been selected for debate and Division. That assures us that the Committee will at least have the opportunity to vote on this important issue—a chance which was in doubt for some time.

Many of those present have spent long hours in the Committee debating the important issues surrounding the treaty of Maastricht, not just because we wish to inform ourselves of the arguments but because we sought to use the Chamber for its traditional and proper purpose: as a sounding board from which the great issues could be taken out of public debate in the country at large.

Notwithstanding the efforts we have made and the hours we have spent, however, we have been at best only partly successful. I believe that the British people are still only dimly aware of some of the issues that we in the Committee have rightly concluded are of great importance.

That partial failure has not come about by accident. It has arisen because some of our leading politicians have tried to ensure that the issues are not publicly debated. They tried to ensure that at the time of the general election. They have now tried to ensure it, with the aid of other parties, by holding debates such as this important one very late at night. They have then tried to be satisfied, unfortunately with the co-operation of many members of the press, that those journalists will have gone home by the time many of the important issues are debated.

These leading politicians have peddled the idea—we heard the Foreign Secretary at it again today—that nothing of great importance is happening, that these are minor incremental changes that follow on inexorably from what has been decided. No one, they say, should get worked up about them. Behind it all there is the constant refrain, the constant briefing of the press, the constant undermining of those who believe these issues to be important, to the effect that these are arcane issues of interest only to obsessives and fanatics. We are given to understand—how often we have heard this point made—that these matters are taking up time that would be better spent on more important subjects. That is the context in which we as Members of Parliament have tried to deal with these important issues.

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman, in his reasonable tone of voice, is talking nonsense. These are crucially important issues and they are being discussed where they ought to be discussed. At the general election, I tried over and over again, as perhaps other right hon. and hon. Members did, too, to talk about these things. I did talk about them, but they were not considered of great moment by the press, presumably because there was no great battle between the parties. But the effort was made, certainly by me and by the Prime Minister, to bring these matters to the fore.

We come to the debate. It is bizarre of the hon. Gentleman to say that we are holding the debate out of prime time because of some conspiracy by the Government. The authors of that discomfiture are much closer to the hon. Gentleman than I am. The right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) and his hon. Friends are largely responsible for that accident, if it is an accident. It has nothing to do with us.

I have taken part in only one or two of the debates on the Bill, but I have read the others. The quality of debate has been much higher than the reports of those debates suggest. The debates on subsidiarity and common foreign and security policy—to name the ones in which I took part—have been of high quality. Parliament has been doing its job. There has been no conspiracy of silence. The press has been more interested in the manoeuvres and comings and goings, but the hon. Gentleman must acquit the Government of any attempt to conceal the issues or deny that they are important. They are very important, and this is the place where they should be decided.

Mr. Gould: The Foreign Secretary may have spoken in his intervention for longer than I have managed in my speech. I was prepared to let him go on because it was interesting and heartening to have what I took to be his assurance that a vote on this central issue will not be conducted after 10 pm. Notwithstanding the length of his earlier intervention, I invite the Foreign Secretary to rise again to give the assurance that no attempt will be made to move the business motion at 10 o'clock. Will he give us that assurance?

Mr. Hurd: Certainly not; it does not follow in any way from what I said.

Mr. Gould: The Foreign Secretary concedes immediately my point that these matters are being debated and decided late at night when virtually no one, with one or two honourable exceptions, is present in the Press Gallery.

Following the painful admission that we have not succeeded in getting these issues into the public domain, let me say something more hopeful. Despite that, somehow, in a way which should give us confidence in our democracy, the people have got wind of the fact that something is amiss. The Foreign Secretary confirmed again that because there was no battle between the parties—he meant the Front Benches—the issue was not discussed during the election. He conceded as much in his intervention. Despite that, the people know that something is wrong.

The people have shown that they understand that the treaty of Maastricht is important and that it would be an outrage for a decision to be taken on it without their being asked their opinion. That is the meaning of the opinion polls, the 73 per cent. and the vote by the Scottish TUC today. That is the meaning of every expression of opinion that I have had the privilege of encountering. I speculate whether any hon. Member can point to an expression of opinion which supports the Maastricht treaty and denies the case for a referendum.

Mr. Salmond: The hon. Gentleman will have heard the Labour Front Bench accuse me of offering a false perspective in the amendment which we have tabled to his new clause 49. With his experience of Parliament, he will know that that is not the case, because the procedure is that if his new clause is carried, the Chairman of Ways and Means will decide whether to call the amendment. Whether that amendment is called and regardless of the result, there would be a further vote on the new clause to decide whether to incorporate it in the Bill. Therefore, those of us who believe in the social chapter in no way depend on the good will of people who do not to force it into the referendum amendment. If that is the reasoning of Labour Front-Bench speakers, they are on weak ground.

Mr. Gould: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is exactly right. If the Committee supports the new clause, I hope that it will support the amendment, because that would meet the stated objectives of my Front-Bench spokesmen.

Mr. George Galloway (Glasgow, Hillhead): Before my hon. Friend leaves the issue of the test of opinion, will he comment on today's extraordinarily important decision by the Scottish TUC in Glasgow? Labour Front-Bench spokesmen made much of the Labour conference decision taken seven months ago or more on an emergency resolution after half an hour's debate and only eight speakers. Not a single constituency Labour party or trade union had discussed the matter before casting their votes. Today in Glasgow the Amalgamated Engineering Union, which is no revolutionary band, the Transport and General Workers Union, the National Union of Public Employees and the National and Local Government Officers Association, and union after union led by their general secretaries, presidents and national executives—because, as my hon. Friend knows, those votes are cast not by some Scottish adjunct of the trade union movement but by the very centre of power in those unions—cast their votes. Does my hon. Friend agree that that marks a seismic shift in the Labour movement's opinion on the subject?

Mr. Gould: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend's powerful point. It simply confirms what many of us have argued on many occasions—that decisions taken even seven, nine or 12 months ago simply cannot be said to hold for ever. That is certainly true of the decisions taken in the Labour movement.

I invite hon. Members to consider another expression of public opinion. I doubt whether there is a single hon. Member who has not found in his or her mailbag over recent weeks and months a rising tide of concern expressed in letters from constituents. They ask, "What is the Maastricht treaty about? Will it really deny us our democratic rights of self government? Should we not have a referendum?" Those are important expressions of opinion and few hon. Members will have failed to notice that that is what their constituents are saying.

Mr. Budgen: Does the hon. Gentleman not agree that the events of 16 September also completely changed the debate? The ERM was meant to be the necessary preliminary to a single currency. The British people cannot be expected all the time to consider arcane arguments about the difference between fixed and floating exchange rates. However, on a pragmatic basis, they are surely entitled to say, "The Government's whole economic policy burst apart on 16 September. It is based upon our implementing the Maastricht treaty. Are we not entitled to think again?"

Mr. Gould: The hon. Gentleman is right. In addition to events on 16 September, there was also the Danish referendum on, I think, 6 June. Many events in the past year or so have demonstrated that the Maastricht treaty is a document from another age, that it was drawn up for a quite different Europe and that it was the concept, the brain-child, of an elitist group of politicians who had their own private view of what Europe's future might be and did not bother to ask anybody else whether that view was shared.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that, apart from the wonderful initiative by the Scottish TUC and by our constituents, there was a similar wonderful initiative within the Conservative party? Does he know that the national conference of young Conservatives, which was held in Southend-on-Sea, overwhelmingly rejected a motion supporting the Maastricht treaty?

Mr. Gould: I am glad to have that piece of intelligence as well, but I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me if I rate it slightly lower in order of importance than the decision by the Scottish TUC.

What sort of resistance is put up by those who oppose a referendum to the popular pressure that is now manifesting itself? What arguments are used by these upholders of our constitution and our democracy?

The first argument, which is hardly to be found on the lips of any true democrat, is that the Maastricht treaty raises issues that are too difficult for the British people to comprehend. That is not only anti-democratic but peculiarly offensive to the British people. What reason is there to suppose that they are any more stupid than the French, the Danes or the Irish?

9.15 pm

Then there is the refinement of that argument, which is that the British people do not know enough about the issues, and therefore it would be unfair to hold a referendum. Even some of those who are most concerned about the treaty have written to me to say that they are worried about a referendum because they are not certain that they understand the issues. Whose fault is that but the Government's? They held a general election and pushed through a Second Reading of the Bill without publishing the text of the treaty in English and they have still failed to publish a complete text of what is, in effect, our first major comprehensive written constitution.

If people are serious about trying to inform the British people about the issues, there is one certain way to guarantee that the issues will be brought out, debated and, at least to a reasonable degree, made familiar to the British people. It is to have a referendum. I have no doubt that, like many others, the Foreign Secretary, anxious as he was during the last general election to ventilate the issues but failing, as even he would concede, would leap at the chance to express his views about the great advantages of the Maastricht treaty.

So far, our leading politicians have not been assiduous in taking the argument into the public domain. I read in today's press that the Prime Minister will speak at a series of public meetings on the issue. That will be a welcome first. I hope that those who are keen to develop the arguments—on a soapbox or otherwise—will support the case for a referendum.

There is then the argument, which is a little more subtle than those arguments that are so offensive to British democracy, and which I have seen expressed in letters to constituents and elsewhere, to the effect that these matters can safely be left to Parliament. That means, safely left to a Parliament that has been elected without considering in the process of that election whether the issues were important or should be supported, a Parliament where the Whips dictate the votes of most right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House, a Parliament that regularly truncates debates after two or three hours, using closure motions, a Parliament that, with all respect to you, Mr. Morris, fails mysteriously and confusingly to find a way to enable itself to vote on one of the few meaningful issues, a Parliament where the Government have made it clear that, whatever the results of the votes on those important issues, they will ignore them and will go ahead to ratify the treaty whatever the outcome, a Parliament in which the Labour party Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen have tacitly agreed to ease the passage of the Bill.

Mr. George Robertson (Hamilton): No.

Mr. Gould: Perhaps not tacitly. Perhaps my hon. Friend objects to that word. I thought—I could have sworn—that I had heard in the House, in the Committee and in the parliamentary Labour party repeated statements from the leaders of my party that they would do nothing to frustrate the passage of the Bill. I have not so far used the word conspiracy and I understand why my right hon. and hon. Friends might be sensitive about the use of that term, but if one takes as a reasonable definition of "conspiracy" that it is an agreement that is tacit, perhaps unstated, to act in concert for nefarious purposes, we might be looking at a conspiracy.

Mr. George Robertson: Perhaps I should not rise so easily to the bait. I have not yet been a member of the national executive of the Labour party and I have not yet been, and may never be, a member of the shadow Cabinet, but my hon. Friend was a member of both those organisations up to the party's annual conference last year. He was there in those ruling bodies of the party as the party's policy on Europe evolved. He therefore had a much more instrumental role than many of us.

When we made it clear that we were not interested in wrecking the Maastricht treaty because our annual conference had laid down that policy last year, it should be understood that my hon. Friend was at that conference. We decided that we should use parliamentary means to secure the social chapter. In other words, we were intent on using Parliament for its primary purpose of ensuring that the issues were debated properly. Surely that must be a reasonable approach for someone who has occupied high positions in the party over many years. Surely it is reasonable and honourable and not a tacit admission of anything other than that we shall conduct the Labour party in the way in which the party has always been conducted.

Mr. Gould: My hon. Friend may be unduly sensitive. It seems that his intervention does nothing more than confirm my argument. Indeed, he goes further and rightly says that the position taken by those on the Opposition Front Bench is explicit and not tacit. The two Front Benches, deliberately or consciously, find themselves acting in concert. That is relevant to the argument that it is unnecessary or wrong to have a referendum because Parliament is able to decide the issue. Given that the two Front Benches are agreed and will Whip their respective followers, surely Parliament is not free to decide these issues in the way proposed.

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman is describing a parliamentary world of which I know nothing. I live in hope of change, but so far the Opposition Front Bench has been unfailingly difficult and obstructive.

Mr. Gould: I am sure that my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Opposition Front Bench have managed to convey that impression. It is remarkable, however, that when there are Divisions that matter, even on Labour amendments, we, the Opposition, fail to embarrass the Government by defeating them and preventing them from ratifying the treaty.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Does my hon. Friend agree that while there is collective responsibility, in which he played a part, it is honourable that when someone can no longer discharge that corporate responsibility he makes his position clear, as my hon. Friend did at a meeting at Blackpool, when I was sitting next to him?

The relevant conference resolution did not endorse the Maastricht treaty. It described the terms, probably with accuracy, as the best available. It did not endorse acceptance of them. That is why my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Opposition Front Bench say that they will not support—they had every right to make this judgment—any amendment that would threaten the treaty. Against that background, are not the two Front Benches, despite the impression of the Foreign Secretary, much more at one on the issue than the public might think?

Mr. Gould: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his intervention. He has the position bang to rights.

I do not want to offend the Liberals because I gather that they support new clause 49—well, I hope that that is the case. The Liberals, however, also have their disreputable role to play, as do some other minority parties, in frustrating the ability of Parliament to deal properly with the issues that are before us. They, too, do their deals with the Government Front Bench. It is—[HON. MEMBERS: "No."] There are denials. I am glad to know that, even if the Government were foolish enough to seek to suspend the 10 o'clock business motion, the Liberals would have nothing to do with that. I am sure that they will stick to their principles of open government and ensure that these important matters are debated before the full gaze of the British people as relayed to them by, now, a virtually empty Press Gallery.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way; at least, I should feel grateful, because he deals with Liberal Democrats in a much more measured way than he deals with his own Front Bench.

I welcome the hon. Gentleman to the cause of parliamentary reform, which my party supports. We want to discuss serious issues at sensible times of day, in a sensible fashion, but current parliamentary procedure does not allow that. Let me add that—as I shall make clear if I am fortunate enough to be called to speak—I shall vote for a referendum. I find no difficulty in trying to aid the Bill's progress so that we can reach a decision about the referendum; I am only sorry that the right hon. Gentleman has not been able to persuade his party to back the idea. The arithmetic suggests that, if Labour, the Liberal Democrats and certain Conservatives backed it, we would have a referendum.

Mr. Gould: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, particularly for his support in regard to the referendum. I only hope that he will be able to put into practice his principles on the first point that he made. That test may well come at 10 pm; we shall watch carefully.

At the heart of the argument of those who oppose a referendum—I mean the serious argument; the rest has been marginal—is the proposition that it would be contrary, damaging and inimical to our constitution. The hon. Member for Faversham (Sir R. Moate) said enough about the precedents to demonstrate that that is nonsense. Those precedents have been coming thick and fast over recent years: we need only look at the writings of A. V. Dicey, the great apostle or high priest of parliamentary sovereignty. Even he argued in favour of referendums as the appropriate response to particular circumstances.

What are those circumstances? Is it not an irony that those who pray in aid the constitution are the very people who are most intent on subverting and damaging that constitution? In my view, not only is our constitution entirely compatible with a referendum on this issue; it demands such a referendum. Even the greatest supporter of parliamentary sovereignty—Dicey, perhaps—must concede, as a matter of logic, that however powerful Parliament is, certain rules have priority over those of Parliament.

Sir Terence Higgins: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Gould: I am sorry; I am in the middle of an argument.

If Parliament did not have such rules, we could not know what Parliament is. Rules about Parliament's composition, identity, functions and procedures must logically have priority; for that reason, they cannot depend on Parliament itself, because Parliament preaches them.

What, then, is the authority that lies behind those rules? Let me use a term invented by the German jurist Hans Kelsen: in each society, state and political entity there is what he described as a Grundnorm—a basic norm. In any democracy worthy of the name, that basic norm must be the will of the people. It is the will of the people which defines and gives authority to Parliament. Parliament may purport to change the rules that define it—to change its mode of operation, and the processes of government and self-government—but it simply has not the authority to go back and change rules which, as I have said, are logically prior to Parliament. Only the will of the people can make such a fundamental change in the way in which we govern ourselves.

So far, what I have said is a matter of incontrovertible legal and constitutional theory. The real question that now arises is whether the Maastricht treaty poses an issue of such fundamental importance that to accept the change involved would be to redefine fundamentally both Parliament and the way in which we govern ourselves. The treaty of Maastricht is not, in my view, just an incremental change. It is a fully-fledged statement of a written constitution for a new state. It is not I who say so; it is the drafters of the treaty who proclaim that they hereby establish a European union, of which we are all to be citizens.

[Mr. Gould]

That union, if we examine it, has, as I said in an earlier debate, all the trappings of a state. It has its own head of state, chief executive, legislature, civil service, bank, foreign representation, defined boundaries and territories and its own economic, agricultural, industrial and trade policies. Above all, it has its own constitution and supreme constitutional court, which sees its function as being to interpret, develop and protect that constitution. We delude ourselves if we pretend otherwise. Even the term "federal" is inadequate to describe what is laid down in the treaty of Maastricht. It may be good, or it may be bad, but that is what it is.

9.30 pm

Let us take a particular example of a very important power of self-government—the power of a democratic electorate in this country to decide what should or should not be the economic policy applied by the Government of this country. Under the treaty of Maastricht, the most important powers over economic policy are ceded to a central bank which is told, in terms, to take no notice of any other institution, and certainly not of any elected Government. That change, of such importance and centrality, is, as so many hon. Members have said, meant to be irreversible. That is what the treaty says.

It is irreversible in the sense, contrary to what my right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) said an hour or so ago, that if the Labour party could persuade the British electorate at the next general election, once the treaty is in force, to elect a Labour Government committed to a different economic policy from that laid down by the European central bank, we should have to say to the electorate on the morning after that election, "We're very sorry, but we can't implement a different economic policy. That matter is beyond political debate and action within this country. It is now a matter for the European central bank." Unless we could persuade each of our 11 partners to change that policy in some respects, it would be beyond our unilateral action to change it.

What answer is given to that argument by those who oppose a referendum? Fundamentally, what I think they say, since they cannot, in the end, deny the black and white provisions of the treaty, is that it does not really matter, that these issues are of concern only to a lot of fuddy-duddies who are preoccupied with antiquated concepts such as sovereignty and who love the word "sovereignty" because it has a wonderful 19th century ring about it. It may be easy to sneer at the word "sovereignty", but it is not so easy to sneer at the words "democracy" and "self-government". Those are the issues, those are the words, those are the terms which are truly involved in this debate.

What an astonishment it is to discover that it is in this House of Commons, of all institutions, that the view is expressed that these are matters of little consequence and that it is in this House of Commons that there is such a fundamental misunderstanding of what these issues really mean. That is the view which is taken in a Parliament which, in its history, traditions and function, is the very symbol of our nationhood, the very mechanism by which we subject to democratic control the power of the Executive, and which is the very instrument by which we define that self which we talk of self-government.

Democracy is not just a matter of mechanisms, or of elections to this, that or the other body. Democracy is a form of self-government. To say, "Well, we can give up the powers of self-government which we exercise, because we shall have elections to a European Parliament" does not meet the point, if the self with which the British people identify is the British self rather than a European self.

Each of us, in our various ways, reaches this place in many cases as a result of great effort. We naturally feel very pleased with ourselves when we get here. It is a privilege to serve in the House of Commons. Merely to be here is a reward in itself, but getting here is not only a matter of self-congratulations, of taking the plaudits and enjoying the benefits. To come to the House is surely also to acknowledge and accept responsibilities, responsibilities not only to the Whips, to one's local paper or one's personal ambition but to what the House represents in our history and government.

If we, as elected politicians, fail to understand that, if we turn our backs on those responsibilities through complacency, arrogance or ignorance, or if we get the political process wrong, we leave the people no alternative: they will have to get it right. They are chilling words. When one looks around the world and sees the vast majority of people who do not enjoy the benefits of democratic self-government, which we now so carelessly propose to give away, and the lengths to which they are prepared to go to get it right, we learn that, at the very least, it can be a messy, confusing and unattractive process.

I hope that when the time comes to vote on new clause 49, enough people—I wish there were more here now—will recognise their responsibilities to this country, to this institution and to the people who elect us. That is the case for a referendum, and that is why we shall press new clause 49 to a Division.

Sir Terence Higgins: It is extraordinary and immensely sad that those who have been arguing hardest and at the greatest length that the Maastricht treaty and the Bill will reduce the power and influence of our Parliament are now resorting to the use of a device that I believe strikes far more fundamentally at the powers and responsibilities of this House in order to achieve their objective of defeating the Bill and preventing ratification of the treaty.

If we continue to add to the unfortunate precedents —referendums have not as yet been that numerous—we shall inevitably undermine our system of representative parliamentar democracy. I stress the word "representative". We all know of Edmund Burke's famous dictum that we are sent here as representatives, not delegates. My hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) who moved the new clause but who is no longer here was a little too fair to Edmund Burke who made the speech containing that dictum to the Bristol electors after he had just been elected, not before. At every election in which I have stood, I have strongly put forward that view. I stand for election to come to this place as a representative, not as a delegate.

The referendum is the exact antithesis of that concept. My hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills spoke as if the referendum rather than the system of representative democracy was the norm. That is quite untrue. I speak with a much passion as he did. I believe strongly that we must defend that representative system. I am not sent here as a computer——

Several hon. Members rose——

Sir Terence Higgins: No, I shall not give way now. I may do so a little later.

I am not sent here as a computer to vote as I would if I knew what the majority of my constituents believed was right on a particular issue. We all have a far more difficult task than that. Our task is to listen to our constituents, to take into account the views that they express, to study matters, whatever they may be, as profoundly as we can, to listen to the debates in the Chamber, and then to vote as our constituents would vote if they had had all those advantages.

Mr. Budgen: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Sir Terence Higgins: I may give way later, but not now.

I believe that that is our fundamental task. It is immensely difficult. It is also important that we should vote not simply in the interests of our constituents in that sense, but in the interests of the country as a whole. One crucial difference between a system of representative democracy and a system of referendums is that minority interests can be taken into account in a representative democracy. In a real sense a system of referendums represents the dictatorship of the majority—that is important in terms of race or whatever other interest groups may be affected.

It is right that we should deal with the fundamental principle of referendums in the debate because if further precedent is set the principle of representative democracy will be undermined. My hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills is stuck with a piece of jargon—"Trust the people." Yes, of course it is important that we should trust our constituents, but our duty is to trust that they will express their views to us on how we should vote on an issue, but our decision is based not simply on numbers, but on the arguments. It is important that we should listen to our constituents, but then——

Mr. Budgen rose——

Sir Terence Higgins: I have made it clear to my hon. Friend that I may give way later, but not now.

It is important that we take into account the arguments that our constituents put to us, and that we in turn advance the views that we may have, which might emanate from the House of Commons. That is a difficult and complex task that we must undertake. That is the sense in which we should trust the people.

The hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould), who was not prepared to give way—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] I shall give way in a moment. The hon. Member for Dagenham said that it was arrogant to say that we shall take a view which may differ from that of our constituents, but in my view we must weigh their arguments. That is important if one is to be an effective Member of Parliament.

I have not heard many arguments from my constituents about the Maastricht treaty. The problem has been rather that I have had to explain the treaty to them. I have done so, at great length throughout the election campaign, at numerous public meetings. I have had a video made explaining the arguments, and so on——

Mr. Cash: I would like to see that.

Sir Terence Higgins: I shall be happy to lend my video to my hon. Friend. It is important that we have that to-and-fro strength of argument; that two-way flow of ideas.

A referendum is a totally crude and different way of approaching an issue. We would be playing a pure numbers game, without taking into account the importance of the various arguments. That is what I believe is the fundamental difference between our representative system of democracy and the principle of a referendum.

Mr. Budgen: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Sir Terence Higgins: In just one moment.

The crucial question would be: what question would be posed in the referendum? There would have to be a crude question and a crude answer. We could be asked the simple question, "Do you deplore Delors?" I must admit that on that question I should be inclined to vote yes, but the gut reaction would be at an appallingly superficial level. It would certainly not take into account any of the arguments that we have had over 29 sitting days in the Committee.

Mr. Budgen: I hope that my right hon. Friend will not think that I am being facetious. I have watched my right hon. Friend very closely for a decade and I know that he is a very distinguished right hon. Member of Parliament who has honourably followed his arguments about the representative nature of our role in this place.

9.45 pm

However, surely the only way in which we can represent our constituents and express our mature judgment in their interests is if the Government exercise a certain degree of goodwill and generosity towards their supporters. That is particularly important when both the Opposition and Government Front Benches agree on a very important constitutional measure. If there were simply a crude and aggressive attitude towards the Back Benchers on either side of the House who disagree, it would appear that the whole House agreed with the measure. At the present time, we have not the respect for individual judgment, to which my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Sir T. Higgins) referred, but simply crude, aggressive and authoritarian behaviour towards those who disagree.

Sir Terence Higgins: I have had the pleasure over the years of serving on various Committees with my hon. Friend and I am always concerned when he makes complimentary remarks about me. He is really saying that when hon. Members seek to fulfil the duty that I sought to outline a moment ago——

Mr. Budgen: They are prevented from doing that.

Sir Terence Higgins: My hon. Friend says that they are prevented from doing that. He really means that they are failing to carry out that duty.

Mr. Budgen: Some fail, some are prevented.

Sir Terence Higgins: It is no good saying that some are failing and some are prevented. Quite simply, my hon. Friend is arguing that the hon. Members who are succumbing in the way that he has proposed—assuming that that is the reality of the position—are failing in their duty. I do not accept that that is true of hon. Members.

Mr. Spearing: The right hon. Gentleman may not be surprised to learn that I agree with a great deal of what he has said, particularly about referendums. The question in 1975 might have been, "Do you believe Harold Wilson when he says that no law can be passed without the consent of a British Minister and that the threat of EMU has disappeared—yes or no?"

Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the ground rules of democracy, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) referred a few moments ago, have been broken successively in the following respects: first, we were taken in over "negotiate no more, no less"; secondly, Baroness Thatcher agreed to European political union and EMU on the basis of a previous so-called pledge without any mandate from this House; and the present Prime Minister claims a mandate on a treaty that he had not published before the general election. All three have broken the ground rules suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham and therefore some of us have nothing left but the device that the right hon. Member for Worthing (Sir T. Higgins) criticises. However, at least it is a device that we can use.

Sir Terence Higgins: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman accepts that it is a device. Before I consider that device, I want to consider a point which, strangely, has not been mentioned in this debate, although it has been in other debates on referendums. I want to consider whether the referendum should be advisory or mandatory. In that respect, we run into some very difficult issues.

If the referendum is simply advisory, it is difficult to see how any new arguments could be advanced which we in this House have not, over many days, considered very carefully. If the referendum is mandatory, that would be a total betrayal of what we are sent here to do. We must consider whether the referendum must be advisory or mandatory and the hon. Member for Dagenham did not consider that point.

Mr. Gould: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Terence Higgins: No, I will not as the hon. Gentleman would not give way to me.

The most absurd way of proceeding would be to sit for 29 days in Committee—and no doubt for longer on Report and thereafter—so that we are all convinced of what the outcome should be one way or the other and then have a referendum which reversed that decision. Will we then come back to the House and say, "We have considered it all clearly; we made up our minds; we debated it at immense length; the referendum went the other way and we will reverse the decision which we, exercising our judgment in the House of Commons, reached in the traditional way"?

Sir Teddy Taylor: Yes.

Sir Terence Higgins: If so, there is a big gulf between us as to our understanding of the democratic system in the House of Commons. I shall come to the point which was made a moment ago.

Mr. Barnes: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Terence Higgins: I will take up the point which was made in an intervention because I have not addressed it. I shall structure my remarks as best I can.

The hon. Member for Dagenham referred to the history of the matter and the way in which we have gone from the original decision that was taken in 1972 through the further decisions and the passing of the Single European Act to the present stage. Earlier, I said that the referendum process, which was used by the Labour Government purely for political expediency, set further in concrete the decision that was made than would have been the case if we had not had the referendum. Paradoxically, those who advocated a referendum at that time, who then lost, have suffered considerably and have reduced the degree of flexibility with regard to subsequent events. We must not make the same mistake.

I shall take up the point that was made about Dicey. The hon. Member for Dagenham must look at different editions of Dicey if he wants to get the conclusion. Neither the first edition of Dicey nor the last was in favour of a referendum. The only editions which were in favour of a referendum were those in which he, for reason of political expediency, had decided to advocate it. I had to study Dicey at Cambridge. It was an unbelievable bore. Dicey has been given too much weight.

Mr. Budgen: He made a living out of it.

Sir Terence Higgins: The former right hon. Member for Finchley was keen on quoting Dicey. In her famous speech —one might almost say notorious—at the time of the 1975 referendum debate, she referred to the various editions of Dicey. I had forgotten that. When she was sitting next to me just before she went to the other place, she said, "It is all in Dicey". I said, "But you have got the wrong edition". She had forgotten her original speech.

My point is that those who advocate referendums—the plural of referendum is referendums—typically do so when they have lost the argument.

Sir Teddy Taylor: How did my right hon. Friend vote?

Sir Terence Higgins: I take up the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham (Sir R. Moate), who put much stress on the Irish referendum. That example is somewhat different.

Sir Teddy Taylor: That is disgraceful.

Sir Terence Higgins: I think—[Interruption.] I am conscious of the fact that we are approaching the 10 o'clock motion. There is some distinction between—to use a piece of jargon—a plebescite and a referendum. On issues involving borders, there is a distinction. I have consistently voted against referendums, and I shall continue to do so.

Mr. Ray Whitney (Wycombe): When my right hon. Friend referred to the question whether referendums—I agree with the plural—should be advisory or mandatory, is he aware that our hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen), who is so much in favour of referendums—[HON. MEMBERS: "He is not."] I misunderstood him. He made it clear that he would not be bound by referendums. I am delighted to know that he will be in the right Lobby tonight, for a change.

Sir Terence Higgins: My hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) must speak for himself. As I understand it, he has always been strongly against referendums. I trust that he will be consistent.

Many hon. Members are inconsistent about referendums. [HON. MEMBERS: "So are you."] No, I have made a distinction on the Irish issue. That is a legitimate distinction. Except on that issue, I have consistently and will continue consistently to oppose referendums.

Back in 1975 the Labour Government, for reasons of expediency and divisions in the party, went ahead with a referendum, thereby creating a further dangerous precedent. The present Government should be congratulated on not going along with that approach. They have stuck to their guns on the issue. They have not been prepared to resort to a referendum to deal with any differences which may exist in the party.

If we examine the matter objectively, we see that there is a clear point of principle and that the House would be right to reject new clause 8. There has been some suggestion that even if the new clauses are defeated this evening, as I profoundly hope that they will, there might be more support for the idea of a referendum in the upper House. I am bound to say that it would be a dangerous action, when the elected House had rejected the idea of a referendum, for the other House to seek to reverse that decision. That would be the antithesis of what our system of representative democracy stands for. That is the basis on which I believe that all Members of Parliament have a duty to perform.

Mr. Salmond: I have every confident hope that I shall finish this speech in prime time tomorrow afternoon. I shall certainly vote against the 10 o'clock motion.

I rise to speak in strong support of new clause 49 and to advance some arguments why amendment (a) to that new clause on the social chapter should be properly considered by the House. The right hon. Member for Worthing (Sir T. Higgins) argued that our view about referendums could be selective. He suggested that we could pick and choose what referendums we had. I believe that we must apply a consistent criterion when choosing issues on which referendums should be held. Surely that consistent criterion should be that referendums should be employed when major constitutional issues are at stake.

So the first question for us this evening is whether the Maastricht treaty is a major constitutional issue.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does the hon. Gentleman believe that the comments of my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Sir T. Higgins) clearly showed that there is a border between Scotland and England? Therefore, I imagine that he takes the view that, if there is to be a referendum on borders, that is one border which must certainly be considered.

Mr. Salmond: I have noticed that the hon. Gentleman has recently discovered an enthusiasm for the concept of Scottish popular sovereignty. He rightly said a few days ago that, in 1707, the Scottish Parliament moved into adjournment. His point was well made. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman understands that I agree with him only rarely, and I hope that he will take my remarks as a genuine compliment.

My point about the consistency of referendums is that we must decide whether Maastricht is a major constitutional issue. I know that the Government have attempted from time to time to say that Maastricht is not such an issue and that nothing much is at stake. To paraphrase them, they say, "It is all right, chaps—everything is going to turn out all right." But most of us who look seriously at the content of the Bill and the treaty accept that major constitutional issues are obviously at stake in the Maastricht process.

Powers will be transferred to a central authority in the European Community, either now or in the foreseeable future. Many of us think that it a thoroughly good idea and are none too concerned about the dimunition of the powers of the House. But many other hon. Members think that it is a bad idea, and want jealously to protect what powers—real or imagined—the House possesses.

The point at issue in the debate is not whether the transfers of power are right or wrong, but whether the subject qualifies as one of the major constitutional issues that should properly be put to the people in a referendum.

Mr. Tim Rathbone (Lewes): To follow on from the hon. Gentleman's argument, may I ask him why he thinks that there was not a referendum either on signing the treaty of Rome or on entering the single market?

Mr. Salmond: The argument has been advanced that perhaps there should have been, but there was a referendum on the European Community in 1975. There were referendums in Northern Ireland and Scotland——

It being Ten o'clock, THE CHAIRMAN left the Chair to report Progress and ask leave to sit again.

Committee report progress.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 14 (Exempted business),

That, at this day's sitting, the European Communities (Amendment) Bill may be proceded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Andrew Mitchell.]

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Eric Illsley and
Mr. Jon Owen Jones.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Again considered in Committee.

Question again proposed, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Salmond: I can only take that vote as a vote of confidence in my speech. Clearly, hon. Members wanted to hear a great deal more, and could not wait until tomorrow for it. There are some advantages in having one's speech interrupted by the 10 o'clock motion, not least because one can hear the football results, albeit the result of the European Champions cup match was disappointing. [HON. MEMBERS: "What was the score?"] Unfortunately, Glasgow Rangers are out of the competition. [Interruption.]

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. Would hon. Members leaving the Chamber please do so quietly?

Mr. Salmond: I am sure, Mr. Lofthouse, that you will have interpreted the result of that match as a European issue, and agree that it is quite legitimate to mention it. [Interruption.]

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. I am having great difficulty in hearing the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Salmond: I notice that, when I speak about football scores, hon. Members hang on my every word. I understand that Rangers narrowly failed to qualify for the final of the European Champions cup.

On new clause 49, I had developed the argument that Maastricht was a major constitutional issue which, regardless of what hon. Members believe about the issue, could properly be regarded as major enough to be put to the people in a referendum. However, there are other specific arguments, because it must be clear that we have reached, to use a fashionable word, gridlock on several keys aspects of the Bill.

We are gridlocked because some hon. Members are pro-Maastricht and the social chapter. That belief encompasses the Liberal Democrats and the majority of the Labour party. Some people are pro-Maastricht but against the social chapter. That is the official view of the Conservatives. Some Labour Back Benchers are pro the social chapter but against the Maastricht treaty, and some people are against both.

[Mr. Salmond]

That gridlocked combination of forces means that we are guaranteed no meaningful parliamentary vote on the critical subject of the social chapter. Therefore, the social chapter should also be put to the people in a consultative referendum. That is why my hon. Friends and I have tabled amendment (a) to new clause 49. If rationale and logic have anything to do with the process of votes in the Committee, that should be an important development.

It has already been noted that the outcome of tonight's vote is in the hands of the Labour party. The arithmetic shows that, if Labour Members are united in voting for a referendum, the Government will lose the vote on new clause 49 by about 30 votes. Therefore, the matter is entirely in the hands of Labour's Front-Bench spokesmen.

Last Friday, 16 April, Labour's spokesman on Europe, the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson), wrote to me outlining his reasons for voting against a referendum on Maastricht. The letter states:

"The Labour Party has made it clear on a number of occasions that it will oppose a Refendum on Maastricht for one principal and very good reason. A Referendum would involve a Yes/No question on the Maastricht Treaty. The Maastricht Treaty provides for an opt out from the Social Chapter for the United Kingdom alone. A Yes/No question on the Maastricht Treaty would therefore not provide any opportunity for a reservation to be put forward in relation to the Social Chapter."

That was the

"one principal and very good reason"

for Labour not wishing to support the new clause on a referendum.

I put it to those on the Labour Front Bench that the difficulty can be reasonably resolved if they support amendment (a). If that is the one, principal and very good reason for not supporting the referendum new clause, that difficulty can be resolved and, hopefully, there can be some reconsideration.

Earlier on in the debate, the right hon. Member for Copeland—I nearly said for Sellafield—(Dr. Cunningham) argued that this was not the appropriate way forward, because the Labour party would be trusting the anti-Maastricht Conservative forces to vote the social chapter amendment on to the new clause. That argument displays a surprising ignorance of the procedures of the House of Commons.

All of us are familiar with "Erskine May", because we have looked at it from time to time. It shows that the procedures of the House of Commons are quite simple. If new clause 49 were to be carried, the Chairman of Ways and Means would take a decision as to whether to call a Division on amendment (a). Whether or not that amendment were voted on, and whether or not that vote were in favour, there would be a further vote and a decision on whether to incorporate new clause 49, amended or unamended, into the body of the treaty.

The danger that the right hon. Member for Copeland foresaw—that the Opposition could be conned into voting for a referendum and then find that they would have a referendum with no reference to the social chapter—is not a real danger. On the second vote on new clause 49, they could simply switch position if there were not support elsewhere for the amendment to incorporate a second question into new clause 49 to cover the social chapter. The Opposition Front-Bench team have nothing to fear about proceeding to a positive vote for a referendum and putting us in the position of having the only real opportunity to make a decisive vote in favour of the social chapter that will be allowed to us.

On the same day that the hon. Member for Hamilton wrote to me explaining the Labour party's fears, I tabled amendment (a) in an attempt to solve that difficulty. However, in The Scotsman on Friday, I found that the hon. Member for Hamilton had decided that the amendments had no chance of being debated or accepted. We are debating them, and I am grateful that the Chairman of Ways and Means decides those matters and not the hon. Member for Hamilton. I hope that he will have a quick confab with his colleagues on the Front Bench and decide, in this new situation, whether the Labour party can support new clause 49, and then go on to vote for amendment (a), which would include a question on the social chapter in the referendum. Then, if we are let down by the anti-Maastricht Tories—I am sure that we would not be, given the expression of interest that I am seeing there—the Labour party can reverse its vote.

I was disappointed by another part of the article in The Scotsman. The hon. Member for Hamilton said that the SNP campaign for a referendum was "belated and last-minute". I find that surprising, because, between 2 October last year and 13 April this year, I have written no fewer than four times to the leader of the Labour party arguing the case for the referendum new clause. I have had no reply to my letters.

I can think of only one other issue in Scottish politics where the Leader of the Labour party—normally a courteous man—is as reticent. I will not develop the argument about local council affairs on Monklands district council. I find it surprising that, given that the leader of the Labour party has not answered four letters over that period, I can be told that this is a belated——

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): That is wrong.

Mr. Salmond: I have the four letters here, and I am willing to make them available in the Library, or to the hon. Gentleman. It is surprising that, having argued consistently over that period, I should be told that this is a belated and last-minute campaign. It most certainly is not.

I have reasonable hopes that the leader of the Labour party might be interested in the referendum new clause. It is not something that the right hon. and learned Gentleman has consistently opposed throughout his political career. On the contrary, he has been on record several times arguing in favour of the referendum as a legitimate device in constitutional politics.

For example, there is the "Bulletin of Scottish Politics" of spring 1981. The right hon. and learned Gentleman was being questioned on a Scottish referendum on devolution, when he said:

"I think another referendum (on devolution) is inevitable. Without one, there is no hope of getting any significant constitutional change through Parliament in a reasonable timescale. Also, given that we had to concede it once—albeit for tactical reasons—it would be difficult or impossible to refuse it on another occasion. I would add that this principle seems to apply in the case of the Common Market too. We have now definitely made referenda part of the constitutional equipment, and we have to stick by that."

10.30 pm

Sir Teddy Taylor: Even if the initiative taken by the Scottish National party was belated, pathetic and cynical, which some, rightly or wrongly, have said, will the hon. Gentleman make it abundantly clear to the occupants of the Opposition Front Bench and to all Opposition Back-Bench Members, and to their trade union friends with whom they are associated, that if they really wanted to they could secure their wonderful social chapter tonight?

Mr. Salmond: The hon. Gentleman's words speak for themselves. As I have said, the Labour party does not have to trust the hon. Gentleman to vote for the social chapter in the form of amendment (a) to the new clause. If he did not, and the amendment was not agreed to following a Division, the Opposition would have the backstop option of not pressing new clause 49 in a subsequent Division. The Labour party is in a no-lose position if it is prepared to vote for new clause 49.

We hope for conversion in the next couple of hours or so. I hope that all Labour Members who are being urged to go home by the Opposition Whips so that only the occupants of the Opposition Front Bench are present for the embarrassment later this evening will be called back now that new arguments are being advanced. We live in hope that the arguments will have some importance in our proceedings as they are developed. We may—who knows?—have a chance later in our proceedings to develop the arguments further. There may be more time for the hon. Member for Hamilton to change his mind.

Mr. George Robertson: Many months ago, the hon. Gentleman tabled new clause 48, which states:

"This Act shall not come into force until the House of Commons has expressed a view of the desirability of a referendum in each component nation of the United Kingdom with respect to the commencement of this Act."

Last Thursday, the hon. Member for Angus, East (Mr. Welsh) tabled an amendment to that new clause, in which he urged that there should be a specific question on the social chapter. How is it that, for about eight months, the new clause did not refer to the social chapter? It seems that the SNP has recently discovered the social chapter and is intent on making a great deal of it. Its position has changed since Thursday.

Mr. Salmond: The hon. Gentleman should refer to his correspondence. On 16 April, he wrote to me and specified that there was

"one principal and very good reason" for the Labour party not backing the referendum amendment or new clause. He believed, wrongly as it turned out——

Mr. Robertson: That is not the position.

Mr. Salmond: Presumably the hon. Gentleman has control over what he writes. He wrote that there was

"one principal and very good reason,

but perhaps I was wrong to take him by such words. On 16 April, however, the hon. Gentleman—presumably he was speaking for the Labour party—identified his belief that it would not be possible to develop the social chapter argument as part of the referendum argument as the "principal and very good reason" for the Labour party not supporting the new clause on the referendum.

In our desire to be helpful to the hon. Gentleman, my hon. Friends and I amended our new clause on the referendum. He must know that last week I had no way of knowing—presumably he had not—which new clause on a referendum would be accepted, so I took the precaution of amending all five. We now know, of course, that No. 49 was accepted. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Hamilton says, from a sedentary position, that there are other reasons for Labour's not being prepared to support the new clause on the referendum. It is a pity that he did not mention them to me last week, but never mind. Let us consider what some of those "other reasons" might be.

I have heard other Labour Members say that a party conference decision last year must be respected. I read the speech made at the conference by the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman); I remember it well, as a speech that was judged in relation to the particular time at which it was made. It was a very good speech. In particular, the right hon. Gentleman argued that the Maastricht Bill had perhaps been fatally wounded by the Danish referendum. He said that there was no way of knowing whether it would return to the Floor of the House. He asked why the Labour party should split itself internally over something that might never arise. Unfortunately, that argument has been overtaken by events; the question has now arisen, and it cannot be dodged.

At that time, the right hon. Member for Gorton had no way of realising that a head-on, meaningful vote on the social chapter would not be allowed during the passage of the Maastricht Bill. That surprised many hon. Members, and could not have been foreseen at the time of the Labour party conference.

There is substantial evidence, with the benefit of the information that we now have, that there is a substantial change of mind among large sections of the Labour movement. Already, we have heard how the Scottish Trades Union Congress—composed of exactly the same unions that composed the Trades Union Congress, which also voted, or at least advised, against a referendum last year—today voted overwhelmingly in favour of a referendum on Maastricht. I was not present myself, but I suspect that the arguments in favour of a referendum were similar to the arguments that we should deploy tonight.

The STUC would be frustrated by parliamentary processes not allowing a vote on the social chapter. It would be well aware that, since the general election, the Scottish Labour party has developed a policy on the constitutional question in favour of a referendum in Scotland—in favour, moreover, of a referendum in Scotland with two questions on the paper: exactly the kind of referendum that my hon. Friends and I are suggesting.

Mr. Cash: No doubt one of the STUC's reasons for taking such a position is the fact that it has discovered articles such as that written by James Michie for the National Association of Local Government Officers about the effect that the Maastricht treaty and the proposals for economic and monetary union will have on unemployment. The referendum question is not just a theological or constitutional issue; it is about whether people will be able to keep their jobs. We only hope—and no doubt the hon. Gentleman will want to suggest—that the TUC and the United Kingdom take the same position, and that the coal miners do the same.

Mr. Salmond: I hope that other groups will do so as well. I should have thought, however, that the STUC would be far more influenced by the knowledge that the cause of Europe has been done few favours by our debates. I think that many STUC delegates would think that the argument for Europe would be far better deployed in the country, with more principle and conviction, than it is being deployed in the House of Commons.

The hon. Gentleman will also know of the deep-seated knowledge in Scotland, in particular, of the constitutional principle of popular sovereignty, which is at the heart of the Scottish tradition—although it is not necessarily always at the heart of the tradition in this place.

I think that the STUC will have realised today that the Scottish and European cause would be helped if the argument about the future of Europe were taken to the people of Scotland and the rest of the United Kingdom. I am certain that the delegates in Glasgow today hope for a change of mind on the part of Labour Front Benchers, which I—along with many other hon. Members—urge on them this evening. The STUC will be mindful of the importance of defeating the Government in an area that is absolutely central to their legislative programme, with all the consequences that might flow from such a defeat.

The hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) came under pressure for suggesting that he believed that there was some conspiracy about the fact that we are debating such a vital subject at this time of night, with the vote pushed into the wee small hours of the morning. I subscribe to that view. There is something suspicious about this vital debate being timetabled in such a way as to ensure that we go into the Division Lobbies very late in the evening. Many people would prefer the vote to be in the dead of night, as opposed to the full light of day.

I suspect that many of those who sit on the Opposition Front Bench will soon prefer to forget about this evening's proceedings and about the vote that perhaps they will engage in later on. I warn those on the Opposition Front Bench that, although they may prefer to forget the dirty deeds that will be done later this evening, the Scottish National party will make sure that the people of Scotland neither forgive nor forget if they support the Government on this vote.

Mr. Peter Fry (Wellingborough): I have been sitting here since the debate started. What is significant about it is the paucity of reasons why we should not have a referendum.

The speech of the right hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) was not so much a declaration of policy as a smokescreen to hide the Labour party's confusion over this issue. One of the reasons often given is that the general election was the time for decision and that that is why the Government have a mandate. However, not a single person during the election campaign ever discussed Maastricht with me; no one asked about it; nobody wanted to discuss in on the doorstep; nobody raised it at public meetings. Therefore, it seems to me to be something of a fraud to say that the general election campaign settled the Maastricht treaty issue.

Another point that has been put forward was referred to by the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould). He intimated that it had been suggested that the public would not understand—that the issues were too complicated. My answer to that is that when we ask people to vote in a general election we ask for a pretty simple decision but what goes into the decision that they take can be very complicated indeed. Many people, for example, like so much of the Labour party's manifesto, so much of the Conservative party's manifesto, and even some of the Liberals'. They take those complicated issues and translate them into one decision. I see no reason why a referendum should not be subjected to exactly the same procedure.

Another point that has been raised is that Parliament has already decided and we do not need a referendum—the decision has already been taken. My view has been heavily influenced by my membership of the Council of Europe. I have discovered that there are two versions of the Maastricht treaty. There is the version that is sold in this country. I believe that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister sincerely believes in what he says and sincerely thinks that the promises he has made can be honoured, but when one talks to continental colleagues one hears about a totally different version.

Mr. Budgen: The Foreign Secretary has a wonderful way of dealing with this. He says that they have rather elaborate language, by which he means that we ought to disregard the language when it seems inconsistent with the gloss that the Government put on the treaty.

Mr. Fry: I am grateful for that intervention because I had the privilege of listening to Chancellor Kohl at the latest session of the Council of Europe. He received tremendous applause for claiming that the train to European unity was on the move. What worried me was that not only was the train on the move but he was the driver, and I suspect that he had put down the lines in advance so he knew exactly what the destination would be.

It is important that the people of this country realise that, no matter how honest the Government's intent, the vast majority of the Community see things very differently and want to interpret the treaty in its exact form. They will not later accept arguments that this or that does not matter.

It is also argued that holding a referendum is not the British way. I respect the views of my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Sir T. Higgins), but there have been referendums and we are now dealing with matters of great constitutional significance. I argue that the handing over of power under the treaty is more substantial than some of the reasons for having had referendums in the past.

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): Is there not a fundamental difference between asking people whether they want pubs open on a Sunday or whether they want devolution, which is wholly within the Government's competence, and asking people to give a view on a package deal, a treaty which has been negotiated with our partners?

Mr. Fry: My response is exactly what I said earlier. Yes, it is a complicated issue, but let us not insult the intelligence of the British electorate. We are jolly glad when they elect us to this place, so it is right to give them the opportunity to express their views on such a complicated issue.

Mrs. Ann Winterton (Congleton): Does my hon. Friend agree that the attitude expressed by the hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson) is paternalistic and patronising? We are here because our constituents vote for us and we must represent them. At the end of the day, if we cannot trust the people of this country, who can we trust?

Mr. Fry: I entirely endorse my hon. Friend's sentiments.

Sir Roger Moate: Will my hon. Friend remind the hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson) that the Northern Ireland border poll was nothing to do with devolution within the United Kingdom and was more serious than the closing hours of pubs? Was it not wrong for the hon. Gentleman to draw that analogy? This is a matter of great constitutional importance and to treat it with contempt by comparing it with pub opening hours is foolish.

Mr. Fry: I am grateful for that information, which I hope that the hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson) has absorbed.

Perhaps the final reason for not having a referendum is the fear that the electorate might say no. Can the Foreign Secretary tell us whether it is the case that, despite the full power of the Government's publicity machine, despite the full support of members of the official Opposition Front Bench, the Liberal party, most of the media, the Confederation of British Industry and the great and the good, in three weeks the Government could not obtain a yes vote in a referendum? If they could not, I suggest that that is the best reason why we should not accept the treaty.

Of course, there are reasons why we should have a referendum. One of the main ones is that I have not heard any effective reason why we should not. However, as someone has already said this evening, the main argument must be that it would give the people of this country the opportunity to express their views. More particularly, it would mean that the people who argue passionately for and against would have to put their case to the country. The complaint of many constituents—that they do not understand—would be removed.

There is overwhelming evidence that a considerable majority of the electorate want a referendum and would feel cheated if they did not get one. There is a strong argument for explaining Maastricht so that people can discover what it will mean, instead of discovering the consequences when it is too late to do anything about it. It is true that some other countries have voted yes. The Irish voted yes because they believed that they would gain considerably from the distribution of EC funds. In some countries we would call that bribery and it is bribery with other people's money, with our money. I do not think that one could ever accuse the British people of being ungenerous, but I suggest that when we are lining up those whom we should support, those who are suffering in Somalia, Sudan and Bosnia come a long way ahead of the people of Greece, Portugal and Ireland.

Mr. Budgen: What about Italy?

Mr. Fry: I will deal with Italy in a moment.

The third reason why I believe that we should involve the British people in making the decision is that it makes good political sense. If the country accepts the Maastricht treaty—I believe that there would be a fair chance of that happening, after a strong campaign—at least the people will have accepted considerable responsibility for the decision. If it goes terribly wrong and becomes terribly unpopular, I can just see the politicians of the day falling over backwards to try to deny that they had anything to do with taking us into that monstrous organisation. At least if we brought the people into consideration they would share that responsibility. I should have thought that that was the right way to go forward into an uncertain future.

Far from being un-British, as some have suggested, the referendum would illustrate the depths of debate that there has been, and should be, in the country on the issue. One of the most disappointing aspects of the treaty has been the fact that most of our partners have failed to discuss the matter in great depth. The reason for that is not too difficult to find.

My contacts with continental politicians have led me to believe that, largely because of proportional representation, which makes their position dependent on their place in the lists prepared by their parties, they have an arrogance towards public opinion that no British politician could afford to share. That is why there has been no full debate. My hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) mentioned Italy, and it is significant that even Italy is now realising the errors of its ways and may turn towards our system of electing Members of Parliament.

Mr. Thomas Graham (Renfrew, West and Inverclyde): May I suggest one scenario to the hon. Gentleman? I support the referendum and I will vote for it tonight. But I have had tremendous difficulty in following the Maastricht debate, and I have received only one letter on the subject since it all began—and that told me to support the referendum.

The important factor is that I fully support the social chapter, and I sat here for two days waiting to speak in the debate on it, but was denied the chance to do so. If there were a referendum, the people of Scotland, and of Wales and of England, the working-class voters and the unemployed, would turn down the treaty if they did not get the right to include the social chapter. We must be sure that any referendum includes a reference to the social chapter.

Mr. Fry: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not ask me to comment on the literacy of his constituents in comparison with the literacy of mine, but I have certainly had considerably more than one letter about Maastricht. The best way to obtain the answers to the questions that the hon. Gentleman wants to ask is to have a referendum.

Mr. Salmond rose——

Mr. Fry: Just a moment.

The most important argument is summed up in the answer to one question: have we in the House the right to give away substantial parts of our national sovereignty without the agreement of the British people? That is the fundamental question which every hon. Member must ask himself.

Mr. Cash: My hon. Friend could also ask whether, in aid of the parliamentary sovereignty to which my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Sir T. Higgins) referred, we have the right to commit political suicide by handing over the whole system to the unaccountable, unelected central bankers, which will effectively prevent us from ever being able to reclaim the powers that the right hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham), who led for the Opposition, claimed were irrevocable.

Mr. Fry: My hon. Friend makes the point that I was about to make. It seems that we are being asked to agree to an irrevocable treaty. However, I was always led to believe that each House of Commons, while respecting the decisions of its predecessors, is able to speak and decide for itself and make its own decisions—something which some critics of Parliament have called the tyranny of Parliament because of our power to make fundamental changes.

Mr. Salmond: The hon. Gentleman will have realised that the hon. Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mr. Graham), in his own inimitable fashion, was simply allowing him to develop the argument that the way to get the referendum and the social chapter is to ask for a vote on the new clause, as my colleagues and I are proposing.

Mr Fry: If I were to respond in the way suggested by the hon. Gentleman, I would reduce my enthusiasm to vote for the referendum. Therefore, I will decline that invitation.

With this treaty, we are transferring more and more decision making and law making to an unelected bureaucracy in Brussels. The move to a single currency —we are committed at least to the first and second stages —will mean that the House will lose the fundamental control of taxation which I remind hon. Members was the main cause of the civil war of the 17th century. It goes to the fundamental duty of the House to control taxation and public expenditure.

I suggest that we have increasingly seen our traditional way of life being affected, even down to whether we can serve cream and jam teas at village fetes. The intervention in our way of life will increase unless we stop the nonsense emanating from Brussels. I am worried that, by our adhering to the terms of the treaty without gaining the consent of the British people, that interference can only increase.

Those of our countrymen who understand what is happening largely do not like it. At the very least, they are suspicious. If they are to be subjected to external rule, surely they have the right to be asked first.

Parliament is supposed to be the protector of our national liberties and freedoms. It is supposed to provide the legal framework within which our people live. That is why—this is very important—when the voice of the electorate has been heard at a general election, the electorate accept the changes of policy that are caused by a change of Government. That is why we are remarkably free of civil disobedience and riotous disturbances in this country.

We are a law-abiding nation because our people have trusted the law makers to act in the people's interest, not in the interests of the law makers. I accept that, in that, the Government are supposed to give a lead. The Government have to put forward policies. However, a wise Government do not live too far ahead or away from public agreement.

In exchange for what is effectively a social contract, our citizens have overwhelmingly supported our system of government. We have not had a serious revolution since 1745 and that was fairly bloodless. In exchange for that, the liberties and freedoms of the people being protected by Parliament, the people have been prepared in successive wars to risk their homes, fortunes and their lives for Queen and country.

Whether it was the thousands who were slaughtered in Flanders in the first world war, the few in the battle of Britain or those who went to free the Falklands, those me and women offered their lives in defence either of ou freedom or, in the case of the Falklands, the right of peop to decide their own future. That is the fundamental poin

In such circumstances, the people of this country allo us to exercise power on their behalf, knowing full well tha they can get rid of us democratically at the next genera election. I do not believe that they have given us in thi Chamber any permanent right to do as we will with thei liberties and freedoms. They have lent us this power on th understanding that he that giveth can taketh away if need be. What worries me is that once we have given it away, w cannot take it back. Surely hon. Members should b asking themselves: can we vote to reduce foreig interference in or domination of our liberties an freedoms? Majority voting in the new system and handin power to the European Parliament and the Commissio mean that we will simply be a smaller voice in a larger hole The best that we can hope for is a series of muddy compromises. We do not get much muddier deals than those that are done in Brussels, considering the massive fraud of the common agricultural policy and, indeed, the extravagance of the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development.

How can we seriously keep faith with our people if we agree to the Maastricht treaty without giving them the opportunity to express their views? The right to vote was painfully won by the trade unionists, those who did not own property and the suffragettes. We do not have any right to reduce the value of what they painfully fought for over the years. Indeed, there is no point whatever in that struggle if we give away our sovereignty so easily.

The fundamental question is: who has the sovereign power? Is it the electorate, representing the nation, or the Houses of Parliament? I believe that Parliament expresses the power of the people on their behalf and speaks in their name, not in our name.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: My hon. Friend heard the sincere speech of our right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Sir T. Higgins) about all hon. Members exercising—I think I have his phrase correct—their judgment on behalf of the people in the United Kingdom. I must ask my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Fry) a question because, clearly, he is reaching the end of his speech. After what has happened, are we able to exercise our judgment? Has not the most despicable, deplorable and disgraceful pressure been brought to bear by the party establishment to force hon. Members to act against their better judgment, against what they have experienced and overwhelmingly against the interests of their electorates and voters? The House is not supposed to exercise its judgment on the individual experience of hon. Members. This whole matter is a fraud and a charade, and Parliament should be ashamed of itself. I hope that my hon. Friend will refer to this matter.

Mr. Fry: I hope that my hon. Friend does not expect me to respond in the same animated way as he made his intervention. I admire him for not voting for any amendments tabled by the Government on the treaty. Tonight, I will vote for the new clause which, I hope, will bring about a referendum.

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): Can the hon. Gentleman think of a better example of the operation of an independent-minded Member for Parliament than the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton)?

Mr. Fry: No, I cannot.

Sir Russell Johnston: According to the Government, he should be de-selected.

Mr. Fry: I cannot think of a better example. The other 649 hon. Members are perhaps not so independent for a variety of motives, including loyalty. [Interruption.] The intervention of the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) has distracted me from my speech.

Unfortunately, it is probably true that in the not-too-distant future this ancient parliamentary building will become the council chamber for the north-west region of Europe. It should become the council chamber because there has been a gradual evolution in the thinking of the British people. In reality, the idea of a European state commends itself to the majority of people on these islands. But it should not be imposed on them. They should have the right to say that they would rather wait and retain the sovereignty that we have now.

As I said, hon. Members have to make up their minds. But I was not elected to the House to take part in such a scale of transfer of sovereignty as I believe that Maastricht will entail, and certainly not without the consent of the British people. The phrase "trust the people" was scoffed at by one hon. Member. I would rather turn it round the other way. If we cannot show that we trust the people, why should they trust us?

Mr. Mike Watson (Glasgow, Central): This has been a good debate and a full one. I have certainly enjoyed many of the speeches by hon. Members from various parties. It is entirely appropriate that we should discuss this fundamental issue not only in the context of Maastricht but for broader constitutional reasons. I believe that a referendum can be appropriate within the terms of our parliamentary democracy, depending on the issue that is to be decided.

The Maastricht treaty and its ratification is self-evidently an issue on which a referendum is appropriate. I am not of the view that a referendum would threaten our system of representative democracy to any significant extent. One of the problems with those who argue along those lines, as some have this evening, is that they assume that because we are elected to Parliament for terms of four or five years, we have the power to exercise judgment on behalf of our electorate on every issue which arises, even those which arise after a general election and those on which we may not have any opportunity to sound out opinion in our constituencies.

That brings me to a specific point about the debate on the referendum on the Maastricht treaty. It has been said before, but it bears repeating. There was no serious debate on Maastricht during the 1992 general election campaign or the period immediately before it. It could not have been the case. The treaty had not even been published in English by the time of the general election. So it could not have circulated or been discussed. It certainly was not discussed openly in the general election campaign.

It has also been said that all three major political parties came out in favour of ratification of the treaty. So anyone who wanted to express a different view was left with merely the possibility of abstention. That is hardly the way of advancing a representative democracy. So when we talk about representing people we have to be clear that we have a grasp of what their views are and what they think are the issues.

My impression from my constituency and from talking to other hon. Members here is that the general public in Britain have a poor understanding of what is in the treaty, what it stands for, and what its effects could be. We all share the blame for that. We should have taken the debate out into the constituencies. Some of us have done that. It has been difficult, but it has not been done to a great enough extent.

Mr. Rupert Allason (Torbay): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, after a three-week campaign in which the issues could be debated on television and there could be many public meetings, the British public would be much better informed?

Mr. Watson: Absolutely. I am convinced that they would be. I had the privilege of spending some three weeks in France last summer during the referendum campaign. Whatever one may say about how the issues became tied up with Mitterrand, economic policy and the decline of the socialist party, it was clear that the issues were put before the French people. The issues were debated every evening on television. There were public meetings in the smallest village halls.

People got involved in that campaign. Whether they voted for or against the common agricultural policy or Mitterrand, people were informed and were able to make their decision on the Maastricht treaty on the basis of the information and the effects that it would be likely to have. Although I personally happened to be disappointed with the outcome, the referendum was a clear plus for representative democracy in France. We could benefit from a similar exercise in the United Kingdom.

The question of threats to our representative democracy have to be tempered with considerations such as the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) mentioned a few minutes ago. He said that pressure had been put on hon. Members on all aspects of the Maastricht treaty. If individual Members could arrive at their own decisions, the argument that a referendum would be a threat to our democracy would carry more weight. Of course, that is not the case—many of them are not permitted to do so, particularly Government Members, but also Opposition Members.

Mr. Bill Walker: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way. He is always courteous to me—he is my pair. Does he agree that one of the problems in Scotland is that we fight a constitutional battle at every election? The constitutional issue is constantly at the top of the Scottish agenda at election time. One of the dangers faced by Parliament is that, if we do not give the Scottish people an opportunity to express a view on whether or not they want Maastricht —which they did not have at the general election—it could have fundamental implications for the unity of the United Kingdom. The hon. Gentleman and I both know that the conduct of the official Labour party tonight will have considerable impact because the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) and others will exploit it.

Mr. Watson: It is interesting that the hon. Gentleman links the issue in Scotland to the constitutional position. I do not believe that the 1992 general election gave anything other than a clear expression of the views of the Scottish people and what they want constitutionally. However, their wishes were denied by the hon. Gentleman's colleagues in Government. Therefore, there is a clear case to be made for having a referendum in Scotland on the constitutional issue. My party and I are in favour of that, and as the hon. Gentleman is nodding vigorously I take it that he has now come round to that view, which I very much welcome.

On the aspects of representative democracy, I was interested in one comment made by the right hon. Member for Worthing (Sir T. Higgins) who is not now present. He said that if we had a referendum campaign and put the arguments to the people, the decision would be made at an appalling superficial level. That argument makes two assumptions. The first is that the people of this country would gain no understanding from the referendum campaign, which is not true; they would undoubtedly get hold of the issues. The second assumption is that most hon. Members understand the treaty, its implications and why they have been voting as they have for the past four or five months. I believe that only a minority of hon. Members have anything other than a flimsy grasp of the issues. But we are suggesting that the people could not pick up the issues—they are more intelligent than hon. Members give them credit for. We are prepared to take the people's views once every five years, but not more frequently. A referendum campaign would undoubtedly serve the valuable function of informing people.

I am in favour of referendums on constitutional issues, and those held in this country have been on that basis. However, they have also—crucially—been about the transfer of power. That theme ran through the Northern Ireland referendum on the border issue in 1973, the membership of the European Community referendum in 1975—if anything was ever about the transfer of power, that referendum certainly was—and the Scottish and Welsh referendums which were about transferring power from Westminster to Scottish and Welsh Parliaments. It is also the issue dominating the Maastricht debate.

I am passionately pro-European, but am concerned about the Maastricht treaty, particularly economic convergence, which is why I shall not support the treaty's ratification. The treaty involves the transfer of power and the loss of power, certainly in terms of economic and monetary policies. I believe that such fundamental issues will adversely affect my constituents, which is why I oppose ratification of the treaty.

I am in favour of a referendum, which is a legitimate means of enhancing our democracy, not undermining it. I deplore the suggestion that those of us who support a referendum do so simply as a device to wreck the Maastricht treaty, which is not true. Hon. Members have stated their case today and some who are in favour of the treaty are also in favour of a referendum.

To make a purely party-political point, the Labour party changed its policy in the early 1970s to one of support for a referendum during the term of the Government led by the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath). The Labour party position changed prior to the 1974 general election, and the party entered the election advocating a referendum.

11.15 pm

The evidence is that it was a popular decision. People welcomed the opportunity of being consulted and having their opinions canvassed. As far as any polling evidence is available, the Labour party benefited and was successful in both the 1974 elections. It is popular with the people. Although they give us a certain amount of power as their representatives, people feel that they should have their say on crucial constitutional issues.

I should like to refer to an issue that has been discussed earlier this evening—the interesting decision by the Scottish Trades Union Congress to change its position in favour of a referendum. It should be stated that that was not the only motion discussed today. I shall read out the motion which established that position. It states:

"That this Congress appreciates the Constitutional importance of the Maastricht Treaty and therefore urges the Government to organise a referendum on the Treaty before a Parliamentary vote.

Such a referendum should be the conclusion of a wide-ranging debate on the details of the Treaty and the further impact on the British and Scottish people."

It is interesting in that it represents a change of position and reflects the mood of the times. In Scotland that would be in favour of a referendum on our constitutional settlement, so it would be inconsistent not to support a referendum on Maastricht.

The motion also has to be set in the context of the STUC policy on the Maastricht treaty. I shall read out a paragraph of a motion which states:

"Congress calls on the General Council to campaign against the terms of the Maastricht Treaty, to demand that the British Government immediately revokes its assent to the Treaty and to call for a referendum by which the British people can freely express their own will on this matter."

That was an anti-Maastricht motion and it was overwhelmingly defeated this afternoon, shortly before the motion in favour of the referendum was carried.

The STUC is not in favour of a referendum because it is against the treaty; it is in favour of ratification of the treaty yet still sees the benefit of a referendum so that the people of the United Kingdom can have their say. That reflects the need for people to be consulted. The people put their trust in us and we should have the confidence to put our trust in them on such a fundamental issue.

Another matter that carries some weight was raised by the right hon. Member for Worthing. He said that we have already endorsed the Bill on Second Reading and it is likely to be further endorsed within this Parliament. He asked how that would sit with a decision of the people of the United Kingdom if they were to vote against it.

Those of us who advocate a referendum are not doing so simply because we want to see the treaty wrecked. I do not know what the outcome would be. Thinking back to the 1975 referendum, there was certainly great imbalance in the way in which the arguments were presented. The media came down on one side as did many of the resources which industry and political parties were able to command. I suspect that it would be little different if we were to have a referendum on Maastricht and that in itself may prove sufficient to sway the decision.

I do not know how it would turn out. I know how I would want it to turn out, but we cannot predict with any certainty because in many cases money brings power and influence and arguments become clearer if they are backed with sufficient resources.

I do not see why a referendum would cut across our parliamentary democracy. We make decisions here as Members of Parliament, but that does not stop us consulting people and saying, "This is what we think, what do you think?" If people say that they want something different, that does not necessarily mean mass resignations and the fall of the Government. We put our trust in the people and say, "This is our view, you can accept or reject it, but we shall let you decide". That is what democracy is about.

Mr. John Carlisle: I have made very little contribution to these debates over the past few weeks, but I have been watching and listening to what has been going on. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) on a most splendid speech. We expect of him the patriotism he showed, and it was appreciated by both sides of the Committee. During the past few weeks, some men and women here present have fought an historic battle against the biggest threat that the House has faced for many centuries. If we ratify this most awful treaty, our children and grandchildren will look back on the event in sorrow.

We all admit that this subject has not caught the public's imagination, as judged by the number of letters they write, although those of us who have shown our dissent from the treaty have probably received more correspondence than others. It has also been remarkable to see, over these weeks, how those who have attended and spoken in our debates have, almost to a man and woman, been those who oppose the treaty. Those who vigorously support it have been conspicuous by their absence: they have rarely been here, with one or two notable exceptions.

The trouble for the Government began when, after Second Reading, they took it for granted that all would be well. Having gained a massive majority last May on Second Reading, why did they not crack on with the Bill to ratify the treaty? The Prime Minister and Government told us that it was because the Government wanted to take stock and sound out opinions, and that there would be a paving debate in November when the House could express an opinion.

When that paving debate arrived, as my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) has described, the most disgraceful tactics were used to get people into the Lobby to support the Government. Right at the death, before the vote, some shoddy deals took place, across the Floor of the House as well as within our party. The tragedy of that evening was that the Government failed to realise that the warning shots that were fired, in a debate that would have no effect on the treaty, were expressions of real opinion. With the narrow margin of three votes, they decided to bully their way ahead and push the Bill through as fast as they could. That was a serious error of judgment, both by the Government and by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): Did not those shoddy deals include some by the Scottish National party, whose members are not even in the Chamber?

Mr. Carlisle: I have never been and am never likely to be privy to the deals made between the occupants of the Front Benches, and I have no intention of ever sitting on the Front Bench—not that any Government would have any intention of putting me there. But certainly, if the rumours are to be believed, shoddy deals were struck, and a great many people should be ashamed of the way they behaved.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Although the Scottish nationalists did engage in a dreadful deal, they have tried to redeem themselves tonight by offering the Labour party the chance of getting its glorious social chapter if its members will vote for amendment (a) to new clause 49 tonight. If the Opposition really care about the social chapter—I do not believe they do; it is a load of rubbish—they can have it tonight, so should they not be grateful to the Scottish nationalists for giving them this glorious chance?

Mr. Carlisle: My hon. Friend rightly points out the divisions between the various opposition parties, but there are also divisions on our side. Many of us have been deeply hurt by the ministerial insults to which we have been subjected. During the summer, we were called naive and described as pigmies, yet all we were doing was reflecting the opinions of our constituents, and expressing, as is our right and duty, the fears felt by them and others.

It ill befits a Government to take it upon themselves to insult their own Back Benchers, and it ill befits Ministers to refuse to go to various constituencies. Indeed, at our annual central conference, it was wrong for the chairman of the party to pick on individuals and to mount a vicious campaign to encourage constituents to turn against their Members. I remind the chairman that it is my party as well as his. I am sorry that he is not here to hear what has been said.

Mr. Budgen: Will my hon. Friend note that our right hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley (Mr. Baker), who was a most distinguished former chairman of the party, has described the whole process as shameful?

Mr. Carlisle: Yes. It was interesting that my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Walden), who originally indicated his dissent, then said that he would support what he called this wretched little Bill and in the end supported the Government. The whole saga has brought out the worst in the Conservative party. At times, many of us were ashamed to be members of it.

In the whole argument on the referendum, I cannot understand what everyone is so frightened about. Many hon. Members have said that we should trust the people, and that their opinion is worth having. As I told the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) during the Division at 10 o'clock, his speech was one of the most outstanding contributions that I have heard from the Opposition. He spoke much sense, in particular when he said that there was an arrogant feeling that the House always knows best and that the people do not know. As the hon. Member for Glasgow, Central (Mr. Watson) said, had we had a referendum, the information which people thirsted after would have been available.

Members of the Cabinet have admitted that they have not even read the treaty, yet they are pushing it through the House. Had there been a referendum early in the process, it would have provided a way out for the Government. They would have understood the deep-rooted feelings on this side of the House, which are expressed not just by those who have consistently, night after night, opposed the Government. To a certain extent, what sticks in our craw are those colleagues, many in ministerial office, who have gone through the Lobbies in support of the Government, as my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham (Sir R. Moate) said, with clothespegs on their noses, because they do not like the treaty. Many have said to me, "Thank heaven there are those of you who are opposing it."

That feeling is reflected outside the House. I respect the decision of those Ministers of the Crown, and I am glad that they are in government to reflect my view. Long may they stay there; but the day may come when they have to ask themselves why they stayed in office and did not follow their consciences, as the rest of us have done.

Like my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West, I was originally against the idea of a referendum when it was suggested by Baroness Thatcher. I thought that it would undermine parliamentary democracy and all that I had stood for in my 14 years here. I do not say now that I want a referendum, since in some people's eyes it might be because we were staring defeat in the face.

This is the largest constitutional crisis to hit the House. Hon. Members have referred to how much things have changed since the treaty was signed. They may still change. The Danes have still to vote. The Germans are in the courts. The French have had an opinion poll since their referendum, with 60 to 70 per cent. saying that they wish they had voted against the treaty. So opinions have changed. The Government should have recognised that. To plough on willy-nilly, as they have done, totally disregarding the will of the people, is wrong.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: I think that my hon. Friend is coming towards the end of his speech, but he has not yet directed his attention to one of the real failures of the debate. It is that, on most occasions, the Government, who are so keen on the treaty, have entirely failed to answer the debate. I have great respect for Ministers, but surely in such a debate, and especially in Committee, the Foreign Secretary, the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the Paymaster General or the Financial Secretary to the Treasury have a duty to Parliament and through it to the people to respond, so that, at the end of the debate, people will at least know the Government's position.

11.30 pm

Mr. Carlisle: I agree with my hon. Friend. In speeches that I have heard, Ministers have spent the whole time defending what they say is not in the treaty. They have spoken about so-called misinterpretation by my hon. Friends who have picked up, line by line and comma by comma, the implications of——

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. Perhaps we could hear a little about the referendum.

Mr. Carlisle: I apologise, Mr. Lofthouse. My hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) diverted me.

During debate in Committee, and as the argument, albeit low key, has raged throughout the country, so opposition to the treaty has hardened. The number of hon. Members voting against amendments and not supporting various new clauses has been consistent or has increased.

I and some of my hon. Friends are a bit long in the tooth, but some younger hon. Members have been under great pressure. One would have thought that they would buckle, but opinion in this place and outside has remained consistent. About 73 per cent. of people want a referendum and would vote no, and that percentage has remained consistent for months. That is why it is remarkable that the Government have chosen not to have a referendum.

Those who are most keen on a referendum were mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Fry). They are the older people who fought in the war. Hon. Members have had many discussions in the houses of those who fought for their countries and came through the last world war and other wars. Those people cannot understand how their beloved House of Commons and their representatives are selling them down the river.

Mr. Graham: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Carlisle: Yes, because I have a certain affection for the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Graham: As I have said, I am in favour of a referendum for many reasons, but I shall not go into them in an intervention. Plainly, if people in Britain saw the social chapter included in the treaty, the Government's reputation might be improved a bit. As long as the social chapter is not included, people will see the Government as hoodwinking them. I am sure that hon. Members remember the campaigning in the run-up to the referendum in the 1970s. We were told, "When we join the Common Market, we will have bigger pensions and more jobs and holidays. We will do really well." I remember that campaign on the streets of Govan and Linwood. We were about to enter a bonanza land. Now those Ministers are telling us, "That is not on. It is too costly."

Mr. Carlisle: I shall not be drawn on the social chapter. My affection for the hon. Gentleman may lessen, and in future I may buy him singles rather than doubles. However, I am grateful to him for his intervention.

My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) drew attention to one of the most helpful remarks in the debate. It was made by the right hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham), who said that nothing was irrevocable. The right hon. Gentleman, who is not here to defend himself, has either not read the treaty or has not fully understood its implications. The tragedy of the whole process is that, once we pass the Bill and ratify the treaty, there is no going back even if decisions were wrong. A referendum would enable us to hold back and say, "No, we are not happy with the way things are." I fear that, in this case, it is not the British House of Commons. Governments cannot come back and overturn decisions. That power has gone, and gone for ever.

The second point concerns the myth that is put about —I regret to say, by some of my hon. Friends—that we should pass the Bill because the treaty will never happen. That is the most spurious and defeatist of arguments.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: And dishonest.

Mr. Carlisle: It is dishonest. If we work on the theory that we should pass legislation, or, in this case, ratify a treaty because we think that it will not in the end affect us, we are all wasting our time. Many hon. Members have used that theory as an excuse not to join us in opposing the treaty. The people must have, and should be given, the chance to express their opinion, which I know would reflect that held by right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the Committee who oppose this wretched treaty.

Mr. Charles Kennedy: The speech of the hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle) showed yet again—it has been a feature of almost every speech from a Conservative Member, not just in tonight's debate but in almost every debate that we have had on any aspect of the Bill—the private horrors in the Conservative party, with pressure being put on Back Benchers, and all the rest of it. We appreciate that the Government must try to get their way, but the referendum issue has a distinct nature, quite separate from trying to change this or that part of the Bill, or to put in the social chapter rather than leave it out. Therefore, if there were one issue on which it would have made eminently good sense for the Government and, for that matter, the Labour party simply to have a free vote to find out the sentiment of the House, it was a referendum.

When my right hon. Friend the leader of the Liberal Democrats first mentioned his preference for a referendum some months ago, it was made clear then, and I make it clear now, that it causes us no difficulty that there are differences within the party. For example, my hon. Friend the Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston), who has been most active during the debates on the Bill, will assuredly vote against the new clause that is aimed at introducing a referendum. I have worked with him throughout the proceedings on the Bill, and I shall be voting for a referendum. That makes no difference, given that we share an identical view—that Maastricht should be ratified and built on along lines that would not find favour with any of the Euro-sceptics on either side of the House, as we should like Europe to go in a more federal direction. We feel that we can hold that view while having open and honest differences about whether the British people should be consulted on the Bill.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, with such an astonishing record of consistency, with such defence of fair and democractic principles, with such courage, the Liberals should be interested in having their peformance brought out in the prime-time debates rather than carrying the whole thing through at dead of night, as they conspired to do by voting with the Government on the 10 o'clock motion?

Mr. Kennedy: I could not agree more with the hon. Gentleman. We were anxious that today should be a clean debate on the referendum in prime time, and I regret that the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) scuppered today's proceedings by tabling a motion attacking the Chairman of Ways and Means and taking up three hours of our time in a debate on that. If there are criticisms, they should be directed towards the right hon. Gentleman, not towards the Liberal Democrats.

Mr. Michael Spicer (Worcestershire, South): I ask this question because I genuinely want information. The rumour around the tea rooms and corridors is that the Liberals are split on the issue. Is the hon. Gentleman carrying the whole of his party with him in what he is saying?

Mr. Kennedy: Given that intervention, I am beginning to feel some sympathy for Ministers who have been trying to get their message across to the furthest reaches of the Back Benches. If the hon. Gentleman looks at the record tomorrow, he will see that I began by saying that there should be a free vote, and that there are different views among Liberal Democrats. I cited the example of my hon. Friend the Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber who holds views on the referendum that are the opposite of mine.

Mr. Bill Walker: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Kennedy: The night would not be complete without the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Walker: Does the hon. Gentleman wonder how hon. Members who represent Scotland and who regularly advocate referendums on matters affecting Scottish constitutional issues can tell their constituents that they could not support a referendum on the treaty? The hon. Gentleman approves of it—I do not—but he must recognise that it has massive constitutional implications. Does he think that it makes any sense for those hon. Members to tell their constituents that they will not support a call for a referendum on the treaty, when they constantly call for a referendum on Scotland?

Mr. Kennedy: That is somewhat off the point, but I am in favour of referendums on Scotland and on Maastricht. One could argue that the nature of the treaty, which involves other powers and other countries, albeit within the EC, means that a referendum on it would be of a different nature from one that would pertain only to our constitutional arrangements. I would not argue for such a distinction, but I appreciate that it could be made.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Kennedy: Yes, but I must then make progress.

Mr. Winterton: I genuinely like the hon. Gentleman, although I disagree with his views. On this issue, however, we are as one in our support of a referendum on the treaty. Does he accept, however, that he was unfair on the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) when he said that that right hon. Gentleman had wasted more than three hours of our time? Tomorrow has also been allocated for further progress on the Bill, when we will merely debate issues on which both sides of the Committee appear to be united. Why should we proceed after 10 o'clock to debate a matter that could be debated tomorrow? If the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues had supported those of us who opposed the lifting of the 10 o'clock rule, perhaps we would have got what we all desired.

Mr. Kennedy: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his complimentary opening comments. We are not privy or party to what the hon. Gentleman's business managers and Whips decide about certain amendments. The hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) spoke about deals, but my party has not been party to any. We cannot plan on the basis of possible Government action; that is a matter for them.

It is clear from the debates that have taken place in the Chamber and outside throughout this whole drawn-out process that the social dimensions of the treaty remain profound and politically charged. Whether the Government are attempting to weave, take the sting out or avoid defeat tomorrow, it is important that the debates on those dimensions are rehearsed then, especially if one subscribes to the view held by the hon. Member for

[Mr. Kennedy]

Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) and many of his hon. Friends about the importance of our forum as the cockpit of the nation. Those debates should take place whether or not the Government have staged a tactical retreat in advance.

The precedent for a referendum on constitutional issues has been established in all four parts of the United Kingdom. Other countries have also held referendums in the course of ratifying Maastricht. I share the hostility that is expressed when we are told that the issues are too complex for the people to understand. That is an awful slippery slope and the thin end of the wedge. Our people have a good democratic track record based on constitutional history and I cannot believe that they would not understand the arguments if they were thrashed out in a referendum campaign, especially when the people of Denmark, Ireland and France were capable of doing so. When people say that it is all too complicated for the typical citizen and the average voter, that reveals more of the arrogance of those who make the assertion than the intelligence of the voters to whom the proposition is being put.

Mr. Donald Anderson: The answer is, as President Mitterrand said, that the people will answer the wrong question, not that the question is too complex. They will answer the wrong question because the response will reflect the view of the Government of the day. The French referendum was about the standing or otherwise of President Mitterrand, views on immigration and views on agriculture—issues which were all unrelated to the Maastricht treaty. I took part in the French referendum and I know that Maastricht played a small part in the decision of the French people. That is the danger of referendums, not the complexity of the issue.

11.45 pm

Mr. Kennedy: Any Member sitting on the Opposition Benches, irrespective of the party that he represents, probably thought just over a year ago, "The damned people of this country made the wrong decision." How inconvenient and troublesome it was for us, but in their wisdom that was the decision that they took. I revert to the thin-end-of-the-wedge argument: if anyone fears that the people will answer the wrong question, or answer the right question but not give the answer that is wanted, which is another way of putting the same thing, he is embarking on a dangerous road.

Sir Russell Johnston: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Kennedy: I shall happily give way to, perhaps, my former hon. Friend.

Sir Russell Johnston: My hon. Friend has suggested that those who are opposed to referendums might be arrogant. He referred to the referendum in Denmark and asked why there could not be one in the United Kingdom. Does he recall that it was established after the referendum in Denmark that about two weeks before it took place about 28 per cent. of the Danish population had never heard of Maastricht?

Mr. Kennedy: Those of us who have sat through the night over the past few months considering the Maastricht treaty might think that the 28 per cent. were blessed. I would say to my hon. Friend, or my party colleague, which is how I would describe him in this instance, that in the United Kingdom the arguments have been pretty well thrashed out when referendums have taken place in the past. The media—especially the television medium—have performed a valuable role in giving a considerable amount of coverage to referendums. I should like to think that the percentage of those in the United Kingdom who had not heard about Maastricht would be considerably smaller than in Denmark.

I must make that the last intervention because I want to——

Sir Terence Higgins: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Kennedy: No, I will not give way to the right hon. Gentleman. I have given way to him already. I must move on.

Maastricht is a constitutional issue. I have much sympathy with the so-called Euro-sceptics as they have dissected the various aspects of the treaty. They have examined citizenship, the meaning of a European union, the provision of a central bank and the longer-term development of a single currency, which are all issues of massive constitutional import for the United Kingdom. It is the Government Front Bench that has bedevilled the entire process. There are those who have told the truth as they see it. They have expressed their views honestly and openly as they see them. I should like to think that my right hon. and hon. Friends and I have done so. On many occasions we have been in the minority, but we have talked about the way in which we would like to see Europe develop.

I acknowledge that many of those who are dead against Maastricht, along with many other features of the European experiment or construction, have also spoken honestly. Unfortunately, the Government have not spoken out firmly and consistently for what they want from Maastricht. They have not set out their long-term vision because they have been trying to appeal to two irreconcilable audiences—those who are in the vanguard, as it were, of European development, who want to see Britain's future firmly enmeshed and integrated in the rest of Europe, and those who are not.

For as long as the House of Commons and the country generally suffer from that vacillation—the Prime Minister, the Foreign Secretary, the Home Secretary and their ministerial colleagues have been trying to square the circle—we shall not be able to say that we have distinguished ourselves with a sufficiently honest or open debate on an important treaty. That is one of the reasons—in regard to Maastricht itself—that lead me to believe that we should secure a more open and honest debate if that debate were thrashed out up and down the land.

I subscribe to some of the criticisms that we have heard tonight and on other occasions. It has been pointed out, for example, that we have had to sit late into the night; certainly we have used our votes to facilitate that, because we want the treaty to be ratified. I should like to think, however, that if a message has emerged from the way in which this extremely important matter has been handled by the House of Commons, it relates to the overwhelming case for reforming our own procedures.

It is high time that we started sitting in the mornings, sitting earlier and more constructively in the afternoons and using prime time in the sense that that is recognised by people outside—that is, normal working hours. The public should see major decisions being made—big votes being taken—early in the evening, perhaps after a day's debate. I should like to think that a referendum campaign could be broadened to cover more than Maastricht itself, and to deal with what the handling of the treaty has revealed about the mechanisms of the House of Commons.

There is, without doubt, a sense that the politicians are out of step with the electorates. We have seen that in the United States, with the phenomenon of Ross Perot's taking nearly 20 per cent. of the vote; we have seen it on the continent, where people are turning increasingly to right-wing leaders of a rather unpleasant variety. It may be the result of the recession; it may be because the political classes have been seen to be talking about Maastricht in what is all too often an exclusive way, not including the public. That is a dangerous position to get into in any individual democracy. It is particularly dangerous when we are trying to weld together a complicated European Community, leading on to a European union that is, itself, a hybrid or mosaic composed of a number of democracies with different traditions and attitudes.

I believe that a referendum at this stage would be a useful way of forcing all of us to go out and explain to our electorate, in as much detail as we can, what the treaty is about and our individual attitudes to it. We might find at the end of such an exercise that there was less distance between this place as an establishment and the country as a whole, and I believe that that would be healthy for democracy itself.

My final point has already been raised by the right hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham). He said that, at the end of the day, he did not believe that a referendum would solve the issue, just as Harold Wilson's referendum in the mid-1970s on the renegotiated terms of the Common Market did not resolve that issue. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman is right; I hope that a referendum would not resolve the issue. The whole point of a referendum is that—like a general election—it provides a snapshot of public opinion on a particular day. It does not show the whole film; it shows one frame out of the reel. In any democracy, the campaigns and debates of both sides will go on. They will not end when the ballot boxes have closed on a particular day of a particular month in a particular year. When the treaty has been ratified—as I hope that it will be—there will be another intergovernmental conference in 1996, and decisions will flow from that. There will be more heated arguments in the House.

Mr. Donald Anderson: There will be another referendum.

Mr. Kennedy: Whatever the Government of the day, if it comes to a proposal for a single currency, for instance, the House of Commons might well decide on a referendum. Why not? We, as democratically elected Members of Parliament, are obliged to renew our mandate every four or five years; equally, when the very basis of our parliamentary democracy is involved, I see no logical reason for us not to try to renew our mandate for Britain's continued involvement in Europe—and for the deepening of that involvement in a more federal direction, which I should like to see.

Although at times our proceedings have been neither neat nor elegant—we have not distinguished ourselves in our handling of the treaty so far—we can go a long way towards improving our reputation by putting the question to the people. I do not believe that we have anything to fear. Despite the strong sentiments expressed here and the reservations expressed outside, I am confident that a vigorous referendum campaign on the Maastricht treaty —which would oblige party leaders and others to line up, broadly speaking, in its favour—would produce a yes vote. That would lead to the authority of the House being strengthened and to the role of this country in Europe being strengthened, too.

[Mr. Kennedy]

Mr. Hurd: Tonight's argument is full of echoes from the past. It started many years ago. In 1972, Parliament passed the European Communities Act. Thus, 20 years ago Parliament enabled the Government of the day to ratify British accession to the treaty of Rome. We thereby then, in 1972, committed ourselves to the defined aim of that treaty—the ever closer union of peoples. We thereby then, in 1972, agreed a system of European lawmaking which we have practised ever since as members of the Community.

When I listen to and read the report of the debates in this Committee, I am struck over and over again—and yet again tonight—by the way in which criticism centres not so much on the treaty of Maastricht as on those two aspects of the treaty of accession. It centres not on the proposals of 1992 but on the decision of 1972. That came through very clearly when I listened to the speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Fry).

When I put that point to my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd), he partially accepted it. It was in 1972 that the House faced, and resolved, this fundamental question of the relationship between its powers and British membership of the Community. As I listened to my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills when, in an eloquent and remarkable speech, he moved the new clause, the echoes were very clear. The arguments, almost the words, were those used by another eloquent and remarkable parliamentary orator, the former Member of Parliament for South Down. The echoes were unmistakable.

Mr. Benn: The point that the right hon. Gentleman makes confirms everything that we say: that in 1972 there was no popular consent. The argument was never presented to the public. The decision was imposed by the Government—whether he was a member of it I cannot remember—on the House of Commons against the wishes of the then Opposition. The right hon. Gentleman is right: the Government have never won public support for that transfer of power. Even in 1975 it was a bit too late, but even after the 1975 referendum there remains deep public hostility, because those who advocate a federal Europe have never had the guts to tell the public what it is really about.

Mr. Hurd: But the referendum that the right hon. Gentleman proposes would not alter that situation one whit. It would leave all the apparatus of the treaty of Rome, the treaty of accession, the 1972 Act and the Single European Act in place. That is exactly the point that I was beginning to make.

Three years later, in 1975, the Government who were then in power—the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) knows more about this than most of us—were divided on this issue and solved this critical internal problem by proposing a referendum. The Conservative party had to define its attitude. Its leaders knew that the motives of the Government of the day were not reputable. They were concerned to keep themselves in office, papering over this division over a central part of their policy.

If there were ever a case for holding a referendum on Europe, that case was stronger at the time of entry than it has ever been since, yet when the Conservative party in opposition in 1975 had to define its position it came out against a referendum, and it was right to do so. The reasons were spelt out on 11 March of that year by the leader of the party. It was her first major parliamentary speech as Leader of the Opposition. I joined almost all of my party, including many right hon. and hon. Friends here today, and went into the Lobby to vote against the holding of a referendum on our membership of the Community.

It is worth looking up that speech. It was a remarkable speech which took into account both sides of the argument. She pointed out that the 1975 referendum was not a principled constitutional innovation, as I have said. It was a device, but that did not dispose of the argument. There was a general constitutional argument which also had to be considered. She dwelt—and we need to dwell tonight—on the nature of our parliamentary tradition, and many hon. Members on both sides of the argument have done so.

12 midnight

I do not believe that our parliamentary tradition has failed, as has been suggested, to cope with the problem since 1972. With the Danes and the Folketing, we have the most highly developed system for the scrutiny of Community legislation. Our Prime Minister was the only leader to go to the Maastricht conference with a specific authority from his Parliament, which was then met in full.

It is worth running through the sequence of events to show how the parliamentary system has worked in this respect. On 20 and 21 November 1991, before my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister went to Maastricht, the House of Commons was asked to approve a motion endorsing his negotiating position and did so by a majority of 101. That was not necessary and probably not even usual before such a conference and negotiation. It was a precaution because my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister was anxious at all stages to carry the House—the previous Parliament—with him.

On 18 and 19 December, immediately after Maastricht, the House of Commons was asked to approve the outcome of the negotiation and did so by a majority of 86. In May last year, after the election, the present Parliament was asked to grant a Second Reading to the Bill, necessary for the ratification of the treaty, and did so by a majority of 244.

This is not an idle or atrophied system. It is parliamentary democracy at work, complete with imperfections—I agree with the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy)—untidiness and arguments about procedure and when we should discuss this or that point. I do not give great weight to the argument that this was done blindfold because it took time to achieve and circulate an authentic full text of the treaty. Of course, it was not done blindfold. Parliament knew what was happening. Those who took part in the discussion at the general election knew what the treaty involved, and the blindfold argument does not stand up in real life.

Mr. Cash rose——

Mr. Hurd: May I just pursue this sequence of events?

Of course there was not a clash between the parties—there was a difference of emphasis—but I repeat what I said to the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould). I do not like to toss around the word "arrogant", which has been tossed around, but his speech was a rather patronising lecture on the nature of parliamentary responsibilities. As I said when he was kind enough to give way, I reject entirely the suggestion that there was a conspiracy to keep the silence on this matter, either in the general election or beyond. Personally, I can testify how often I tried to include in that campaign the speeches and broadcasts on the subject—admittedly for party political reasons, as I wanted to bring out the nuances between the parties. However, it was not possible to do so because, from the media's point of view, it was not a great issue.

Mr. Cash: Does my right hon. Friend recall that he advocated a White Paper during the leadership election campaign? Will he explain why we had no White Paper? Since Second Reading and our withdrawal from the exchange rate mechanism, and in the light of the Danish referendum, how can we give the same credibility to the Second Reading that we might have done in May last year? Does he agree that the circumstances have changed radically, as result of which we deserve a referendum?

Mr. Hurd: We had a White Paper on events in the Community, but as I recall it was made particular by a foreword by the Prime Minister. Of course events move on. I accept what my hon. Friend says about that. There were the Danish referendum and the events of 16 September, but the treaty is the same treaty. I do not accept my hon. Friend's analysis of the ERM. There have been many discussions about that in the Committee, and I do not accept that what happened revolutionised the situation in the way that my hon. Friend described.

I make this point gently, but it is odd that those who would put most emphasis on the sovereignty of the House believe that it needs to be buttressed, to put it mildly—I would say that it would be weakened—by recourse to a referendum on the matter before us.

I share the opinion of those who think that if there were a campaign a referendum would endorse the treaty. I cannot prove it, but I think it likely that once the phantasms were effectively swept away, that would probably be the result. We certainly are not taking our present line because of fear of a negative result.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): I ask my right hon. Friend one question: does he believe that the majority of Conservative voters are in favour of the treaty on European union?

Mr. Hurd: I cannot prove it scientifically to my hon. Friend, but I believe that the answer is yes.

As Parliament is sovereign——

Mr. Budgen: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Hurd: I shall get on a bit, and then I shall give way to my hon. Friend, as I believe that I always have done.

As Parliament is sovereign, it is clear that it could decide to hold a referendum, which it could either accept or reject. It could certainly choose, as it has before, to ask for advice from those who sent us here. But I return to the fact that we owe our constituents our judgment, and if we decline to exercise that judgment we are to some extent damaging the authority of Parliament.

Many people can be quoted on both sides of the argument. One of those is certainly Winston Churchill. My hon. Friend the Member for Faversham (Sir R. Moate) referred to him. When the point came up in 1911 Churchill said:

"We believe in democracy, we believe in representative institutions, we believe in democracy acting through representative institutions . . . We believe Members of Parliament are representatives, not delegates. We believe that Governments are the guides as well as the servants of the Nation."

I readily acknowledge that Churchill can also be quoted on the other side of the argument, but when he held the opposite view in 1945 the normal constitutional procedures were in suspense, as my hon. Friend would agree.

My right hon. Friend the Baroness Thatcher quoted Dicey in her speech in 1975, but, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) said, Dicey too, went through a flip-flop. He was against referendums in one edition and in favour of them in another, when he passionately opposed home rule. Then he reverted to wisdom in what I believe was his final edition, and he was against referendums again. One could now also quote my right hon. Friend the Baroness Thatcher on both sides of the argument, but it might be prudent to resist the temptation to do so.

Mr. Budgen: May I refer my right hon. Friend back to the question that my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) asked him about the balance of opinion within the Conservative party? Judging by his own local party, does he agree that it is probable that about half the Conservative party in the country opposed the treaty? Yet out of a parliamentary party of 335 Members, only 26 oppose the treaty—between 8 and 9 per cent. Does that not show that, as a result of the pressures on the parliamentary party, we in that party do not even begin to represent the balance of opinion in the party outside?

Mr. Hurd: As I said to my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill)—and I am not sure whether my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) has buttressed the argument—there is no scientific measure.

Like the Labour party, the Conservative party has a party conference. We had a trot around this course at the last party conference. We had a very lively debate in which I and others had the privilege to take part. We had a vote at the end of that debate and the result was very satisfactory from my point of view. That was after the Danish referendum and after the events of 16 September. That was the Conservative party in full plenary conference, expressing its views very substantially and clearly on that particular issue. We do not have quite the same rigid views about our party conferences as the Labour party, but my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-East is provoking me into making constitutional doctrine in this matter.

My hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills was absolutely right. The 1975 referendum is not the only referendum that has been held. However, it is not fair to go on to argue, as my hon. Friend did, being a little economical with history, that the referendum has become a normal part of our constitutional practice.

The strongest point in the armoury of my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills was the Northern Ireland border poll. I accept that. It is the only example of a referendum being put into practice by a Conservative Government. Others have been toyed with for different reasons by leaders of the Conservative party, but they were not actually activated. In that, as in many respects, Northern Ireland is unique in the politics of the kingdom.

[Mr. Hurd]

An act of self-determination solely for the people of the Province was, and remains as it is still on the statute book, a reasonable technique.

I want now to consider the proposal for a referendum on this subject. We have contended throughout the debate that the treaty does not mark a fundamental constitutional shift. When we joined the European Community we joined a body with both an economic and a political dimension. If we read through the debates in 1972, through the literature of 1975 and through the document that the leader of my party sent to party activists during the 1975 campaign, the political and economic arguments for remaining in the Community are clear.

The doctrine of the primacy of Community law that lies at the heart of so many understandable criticisms about the nature of the Community is a doctrine of 1972, not of the treaty of Maastricht.

Mr. Donald Anderson: Is not that argument fortified by the 1975 referendum which surely cannot have been a decision on a Europe that was static and which would remain fossilised in the 1975 position? Inherent in that popular vote in 1975 was a vote for the dynamic Europe that would evolve.

Mr. Hurd: That is right. However, the hon. Gentleman's point begs the question of in which direction it should evolve and I will consider that in a minute.

The use of qualified majority voting is perhaps a test. It was not invented in the treaty of Maastricht. It is in the treaty of Rome. It received its greatest extension in the Single European Act. There was no referendum on that and precious little call for one.

The treaty of Maastricht adds to and, in some helpful ways, redefines and corrects the Single European Act and, I believe, is on the whole less constitutionally innovative than that Act. We have discussed subsidiarity and I will not repeat those arguments. Whether or not people believe that it is a weak or strong buttress, it is certainly an advance on the present position from the point of view of most hon. Members. That is an example of the point that I am trying to make.

Of course the treaty provides for the three stages of economic and monetary union. I deal with that point because many hon. Members have stressed it. In respect of the third stage of economic and monetary union, the only stage where compulsion comes into it, the Government have specifically and successfully reserved the decision for the House of Commons.

I will not go through all the details, but in other respects with regard to the treaty we have advanced our arguments and analyses. In the big new areas of European work, for the first time the principle of ever-closer union to which we have been committed since 1972 is defined in the treaty of Maastricht as co-operation between national Governments accountable to national Parliaments. It need not have been so. I mentioned that there was a Dutch draft in September which swept away that concept and put all European work under the court with the Commission having the monopoly initiative. We rejected that. The treaty that is before us is on a different basis.

12.15 am

Mr. Spearing: Does the Foreign Secretary agree that the treaty of union requires the whole to be under a single institutional structure, even allowing for intergovernmental matters? Does he agree that the intergovernmental mode, of which he and the Prime Minister have made great play, will be inevitably interlarded in meetings of various Ministers, including the Foreign Secretary, in the general council? Therefore, the two in practice, as distinct from law, will become increasingly indistinguishable.

Mr. Hurd: The single framework of which the hon. Gentleman speaks includes intergovernmental co-operation. That co-operation was not included before: it was always the Community. The question was: how far should the Community's jurisdiction and activity extend? We now have a new structure under the Council of Ministers—the heads of state and Government—but not under the Commission. We have a different structure which includes, for the first time, the two new pillars. The hon. Gentleman knows that that is the difference.

The House has the right and the capacity under our system to approve the treaty if it decides to do so. Other countries have referendums. Nine member states have proceeded through the parliamentary process and three have proceeded through the referendum technique. Having listened to my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough and others, there is one point that I must stress because it is a difference between now and 1975. The treaty of Maastricht is not a take it or leave it matter as far as the Government are concerned. It cannot be detached from the rest of the Government's programme. I do not know what Lord Wilson's Government would have done if the vote had been no. I do not know how on earth it would have managed to take out of its policies something which even then was clearly central. I do not know how it would have wrestled with that.

Ratification of the treaty lies at the heart of our national interest: it is not an optional extra. We have made that point in the House at the cost of some crtiticism and discomfort. Governments are elected to govern and, in this case, to propose, just as Parliaments in the United Kingdom are elected to decide and, indeed, to dispose.

My hon. Friend the Member for Faversham made a critique which was much fairer and more balanced than that of the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould). [Interruption.] It is not "Oh, dear". I have noticed the way in which the speeches of my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham have evolved with the passage of time since the days 20 years ago—[Interruption.] I am embarrassing him so I will leave that train of thought—but it is true.

One point made by my hon. Friend was true—my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough also referred to this. It is true that a good many of those who have consistently argued in favour of a steadily centralising Europe have not abandoned that belief. They will continue to argue for it. They have received—and they know it—not a rout or total reversal but a check in the way in which the Maastricht treaty came out, compared with the Dutch draft which I mentioned. They will live to argue again.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough referred to Chancellor Kohl. Chancellor Kohl specifically rejects the notion of a super-state and specifically endorses and emphasises the notion of subsidiarity. He uses phrases about a united Europe, just as Winston Churchill did. His question is: how is that defined?

I must quarrel with the point made by the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye. I cannot accept that the Prime Minister and other hon. Members on the Government Front Bench have failed to set out the sort of Europe that they want. Time and again in the House and outside, we have said that we believe in a Europe which is enlarged beyond its present membership of 12, open trading and decentralising and which uses, makes a success of and keeps distinct the intergovernmental pillars in the treaty. We have set out the idea time and again. It can be realised only on the basis of the treaty. It certainly cannot be realised by tearing up the treaty. But on that basis I believe that once the treaty is ratified we can go ahead and play an increasingly influential part in achieving that type of Europe. That is certainly the aim of the Government.

Let us consider what would happen if the series of new clauses were passed. I shall not dwell on what would have to happen immediately. There would have to be legislation. We would have to spend many hours, days, even weeks, working out the question, the date and how the various organisations would be financed. We would spend many more days not on substance but on procedure. I am not sure that that is what is expected of us.

Of course, all that work would be justified if my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills were right and we proposed constitutional revolution and destruction. I hope that I have demonstrated that the treaty does not represent that.

Mr. Graham: We have seen the House divided and many hon. Members have argued furiously about the rights and wrongs of Maastricht. We have spent months and months on it while unemployment has increased, factories have been closed, and people have died because they could not afford to live in this country. Surely if we had a referendum in three weeks it would be clear whether the people of Britain supported the Maastricht treaty or not. We could get on with normal living and hopefully make Europe a better place to live in. We cannot come to a final decision because the House is divided. So why not leave it to the supreme power in Britain—a referendum of the people?

Mr. Hurd: It is odd for a Member of Parliament, even the hon. Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mr. Graham), to suggest that, because Parliament is divided and different views are strongly expressed, we should avoid or transfer the decision. That is an odd doctrine. Few major propositions in the House are not divisive in the sense that people argue about them strongly within and between parties. That is not normally regarded as an argument for refusing to take a decision on an issue when so much work has gone into its discussion.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Hurd: I wish to get on, if I may.

It is sometimes said that we have put the decision into the hands of the Danes. That is completely erroneous. The decision for Britain lies where it belongs—in the hands of the British Parliament. We are preparing, in an admittedly untidy, imperfect but I think lively way, for that decision with a thoroughness of parliamentary debate.

I want to deal with the nature of the debate. We need not be ashamed of it. The press has been much keener to report manoeuvres and excitements outside the Chamber than what has been said inside the Chamber. I have taken part admittedly in only two of the debates in the Committee. I suppose that they were two of the more interesting debates—on subsidiarity and on the common foreign and security policy. I have read the others.

Obviously, I believe that those of us who put our case on the two matters which I have mentioned, and on others, had the better of it. I believe that we showed that subsidiarity was a real concept and demonstrated the helpfulness of the common foreign and security policy based on co-operation. But I am sure that some right hon. and hon. Members who were critical of those parts of the treaty felt that they had the best of it. But no one who sat through at any rate those two debates—and I believe that the same is true of others which I have read—can deny that the debates were of high quality and that the informal coming and going of the Committee stage enabled it to be of high quality.

Ministers and, indeed, critics were exposed to a coming and going of discussion which I thought was considerably better than the reports of it allowed. The House was doing its job. The House is doing its job. It is preparing for the final decision which it will take on Third Reading.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): Does my right hon. Friend think that the quality of our debates was enhanced by the virtually indiscriminate use of the closure? On occasions Front-Bench spokesmen, and in the case of the citizenship debate the Home Secretary himself, did not even answer the questions and points that were put in the debate.

Mr. Hurd: I think that, as always, many criticisms could be made about the way in which our debates have been conducted, but I do not think that one of them could be that the Committee has hustled through debates on the Bill. I do not think that that would be the general view of those who have assisted in the votes and I do not think that the accusation of undue speed could accurately be levelled. Ministers have done their job of replying to the points made in the debate.

It would be wrong and foolish to abandon or transfer the work. It would be a shirking of the responsibilities that we were given only a year ago, and it would be a blow to the standing of the House in years to come. We would be saying to our constituents, "We have examined the matter, but we do not intend to take a decision. We have spent hours, days and weeks examining the issues and now it is over to you. We are going to throw the treaty, with all its diverse controversies and complications, into your laps to make of it what you will." I agree with the principles set out by Lady Thatcher in 1975. It cannot be right to refuse to do our job, so it cannot be right to accept the new clauses.

Mr. George Robertson: Unusually for a debate in this Committee, I am seeking to catch your eye, Dame Janet, in order to participate. I say "unusually" because on only one previous occasion has a member of the Opposition Front Bench chosen to participate at the end of a debate as well as at the beginning. My right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) made only brief introductory comments, and many comments have been made by other hon. Members, so it is right and proper that, as a member of the Opposition Front-Bench team which has come in for some attention during the debate, I should respond to some of the issues that have been raised in the interesting, wide-ranging and varied debate.

The issue is important for the Committee, which is why my right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland made the Labour party's position clear today. Our position should come as no surprise, as it was not adopted for the convenience of today or this stage of the Committee's debates. It was adopted after considerable consultation, and was finally decided on at the annual Labour party conference last October by an overwhelming majority.

In order to get the matter out of the way, I should first like to deal with the issues raised by the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) on behalf of the Scottish National party. If what I have to say seems arcane to hon. Members from south of the border, they should listen carefully. During the past few weeks only, the Scottish National party has been campaigning for a vote on the referendum and for the Labour party to join SNP Members in the Division Lobby to defeat the Government. The SNP has been advancing that argument on the basis of a thesis that to do so, and to defeat the Government and approve new clause 49, would bring down the Government—or, at the very least, force the resignation of the Prime Minister. The hon. Gentleman said that we would never be forgiven by the Scottish people for voting with the Government to keep the right hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major) in his position as Prime Minister.

It is on that basis that the Scottish National party has created its argument in the past few weeks. What evidence does that party have that, faced with the prospect of defeat this evening, the Foreign Secretary would say that it was a resigning matter for either him or the Prime Minister? I do not believe that they would resign. We know from experience what happened on the occasion when, in Committee, the Government were foolish enough to put a proposition to the vote and were defeated on the issue of the Committee of the Regions. I understand that the Foreign Secretary was out of the country at the time, and the Government were not forced to a humiliating defeat on his advice. Whatever happened, they learned their lesson, and on three subsequent occasions, facing defeat, they simply accepted our amendments. Ministers would have to accept the will of the House. If there were a referendum, they would have to ask the Scottish National party and its leader to help them in the campaign for the Maastricht treaty. That would be the effect.

There is no evidence to suggest that the Prime Minister, the Foreign Secretary or anyone of note in the Government would resign if Parliament decided on a referendum, yet we are being told that it is critical and crucial and that the Government hang by a thread this evening, relying for their survival and the Prime Minister's future only on the votes of Labour Members.

Mr. Austin Mitchell Will my hon. Friend give way?

12.30 am

Mr. Robertson: Let me finish explaining the position.

We are then told that the Labour party and the SNP would not have to campaign with the Government for a Maastricht treaty that did not include the social chapter, because the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan has produced amendment (a) to new clause 49.

I have to tell right hon. and hon. Members who have just come in, and who may well be at their first debate of the Committee, that amendment (a) to which the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan gave so much attention this evening, the critical point that he says obliges the Labour party to vote for the referendum, was tabled last Thursday. However, the SNP has tabled its own new clause calling for a referendum.

I concede that the idea of a referendum is not a new SNP policy, because it tabled its own new clause 48, which does not contain any reference to the social chapter. It was not tabled last Thursday or starred this Monday; it was tabled on 2 December 1992, 19 weeks ago.

For 18½ weeks, the SNP has been campaigning for a referendum without any questions on the social chapter, a referendum on a treaty that specifically excludes Britain from the social chapter. However, last Thursday, SNP Members decided, realised or woke up to the fact that they could do something that could give them a momentary advantage. Why would they look for advantage? Why would the SNP want to criticise the Labour party for voting with the Government? They want to get off the hook.

This elaborate, noisy smokescreen has been put up for only one reason—to cover up the cynical way in which, only a few weeks ago, the gullible SNP teamed up with a desperate Government to stand against the principle of elected councillors representing Britain on the European Committee of the Regions. That is why they have made such a big issue of this and why last Thursday, opportunistically, they tabled an amendment (a) to each of those new clauses.

Mr. Salmond: Clearly, the hon. Gentleman has been shaken and stirred by the arguments that have been deployed. Can he have forgotten that only last week he sent me a letter saying that, the Labour party would not help to defeat the Government this evening—it would not be possible to get the social chapter into the referendum argument? Now that the fig leaf has been removed, what excuse does the hon. Gentleman have for saving the Prime Minister's skin this evening?

"for one principal and good reason",

Mr. Robertson: There we have it. This is the man who was trying to save the Prime Minister's skin only a few weeks ago—the very man who led his party into the Lobby to save the principle of Government appointees serving on the Committee of the Regions—and now he dares to lecture me on the subject.

One of the principal reasons why we are not interested in a referendum is that, almost inevitably, with a Conservative Government putting the question to the country, we would be obliged to campaign for a Maastricht treaty that did not contain the social chapter. That is not the only reason; we have, after all, developed our policy on a referendum over the past year, not in the past five days.

We all know why the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan is so desperate. Anyone who has read the Scottish press and learned what has happened in the SNP over the past few weeks knows perfectly well the reasons for this evening's burst of indignation. If the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues who are members of the SNP national executive had not voted for themselves on a motion of censure, they would indeed have been censured by the national executive committee of the SNP.

Everyone knows that this is not a question of bringing down the Prime Minister. This SNP amendment has little or no chance of gaining the support of the Tory dissidents. Yet we are told to change the policy that we have adopted over the past year. That is a bogus and cynical attempt to wriggle off the hook that the Scottish people will never let the SNP wriggle off.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Robertson: I may eventually come to some of the points that my hon. Friend has raised. After all, I have been listening to them for the past nine years.

During the debate, some hon. Members have put up arguments supposedly advanced by those who oppose a referendum and then easily shot those arguments down. That is the simplest and oldest debating trick in the book. We are told that some say that the issue is too difficult for the British people to decide. I have never heard anyone, anywhere, say that. If it were true, the House could not decide the matter either. It is a patronising argument, and I have never heard anyone advance it.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) claims that some people say that progress towards economic and monetary union does not matter anyway. I have never heard anyone say that either. Even those in favour of the treaty say that it matters. We have all, in fact, said that it matters.

We have been told that the nature of the treaty is so fundamental that Parliament must put it to a plebiscite. But the treaty does not concern only one issue. Some hon. Members have been honest enough to admit that not just one referendum is being asked for; there would have to be another on stage 3 of economic and monetary union. That, too, is fundamental. If so, why not have another on progress towards a common foreign and security policy? What about the transition to a common asylum policy? Where do we stop? When should Parliament stop taking decisions and start holding referendums?

I was one of the few people here who were on the Labour Front Bench to discuss the Single European Act in 1976—[HON. MEMBERS: "Nineteen eighty-six."] It just seems that long ago. I was in a road accident in 1976.

Some Conservative Members and some of my hon. Friends will remember that there was rarely such a large attendance at debates in 1986. Of course, the Conservative party put through probably the most fundamental treaty not just without a referendum but on a guillotine. I am not surprised that my good old friend, the right hon. Member for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen), is not here tonight, although he has been a consistent attender at many of these debates. There may be a good reason for his absence, but I can think of one: he was the Leader of the House who moved the guillotine motion. I do not think that he likes to be reminded of that.

Is the treaty irrevocable? Is that the real reason why some people want a referendum? The original decision was on being in or out. If we are in the Community, we are all in the same boat—sharing sovereignty, sharing decisions, occasionally winning, occasionally losing. The decision is not irrevocable. The country can decide whether we are in or out of the European Community. That decision can be made and, if necessary, would be made by Parliament. Nothing is irrevocable.

Mr. Shore: It is the most extraordinary flight of fancy to pretend that, as we sign treaty after treaty with a European connection, we have the equal right that we had before we began this disastrous process to reverse it and pull out if we dislike something. My hon. Friend knows that that is not so. The real reason why we should have a referendum on this occasion is that, in spite of the fact that earlier treaties, all of which I have opposed, handed over great chunks of British power to decision-making in the European institutions, this treaty signs us up to a European union which carries the shape of a new state in Europe. If my hon. Friend cannot understand that, he is not fit to speak for my party.

Mr. Robertson: I do not think that my right hon. Friend ever thought that I was fit to speak on the issue for my party, so that does not come as news to me. I will not rehearse all my usual complimentary remarks about him. Although he has lost the argument and the vote in the Labour party consistently, the reality is that, if the representatives of this country want to come out of the Community and want to get out of the union that is being created—probably only in name—by the treaty, they can do it. I do not want to do that; I do not see the same spectres in the night as so many others do. If the country wants to get out of the Community, it has the right to do so, and nobody can stop it.

Hon. Members have said that we must let the people have a direct say. On what? It is not a simple, straightforward treaty on one issue. On which issues would the people have a say? Would it be on economic and monetary union and a single currency? Would it be on more powers for the European Parliament, or on more new competences in the Community? A yes or no answer is not relevant in circumstances where there is a series of issues.

Parliament has been able to consider the Bill. The Opposition Front Bench has not sought to wreck the treaty on any individual amendment, nor should we. We never said that we would do that. Every socialist party in the European Community and in all the applicant countries wants the Maastricht treaty, so we will not wreck it for them on the basis of one amendment on one aspect. The Government wanted to make the Committee of the Regions some mini health board consisting of a handful of friendly Tory business men, Government appointees. We forced them to accept that it will be made up of locally elected representatives.

On Monday, the Government accepted new clause 1, which places an obligation on the Governor of the Bank of England to place a report before Parliament. New clause 2 and amendment No. 420 were accepted. Who knows what the Government will accept at the end of tonight's debate?

That all happened because Parliament went through the Bill. Without destroying the treaty, we have improved it for the whole of Europe. A yes or no referendum would not and could not do that.

Mr. Gill: Does the hon. Gentleman believe that the majority of Labour voters are in favour of this treaty on European union?

12.45 am

Mr. Robertson: Yes, I do. [Interruption.] I cannot prove that they do, any more than the hon. Gentleman can prove that they do not. When the Labour party conference debated it last year after the election and after debate in the party on the treaty as a whole, an overwhelming majority said that, although it was not perfect, it was the best that was obtainable in the circumstances.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham advanced an argument that is not confined to Opposition Members. He said that Parliament was not really reliable to carry out such scrutiny. He said that, after all, we are all subject to the Whips and that, when both Front Benches agreed on the basic thesis that the Maastricht treaty should go through, Parliament was not reliable. My hon. Friend was in the shadow Cabinet for years telling people what the whipping would be for the following week. Now he tells me that Parliament has no right to a say and cannot make decisions on its own, that it is precluded from doing so because the party leaderships, through their decision-making machinery, some of which is democratic and some of which is certainly not democratic, have decided. That does not stand any scrutiny.

Mr. Allason: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Robertson: No. I wish to make progress.

It was said that, during the election campaign, there was a cover-up conspiracy by the two Front Benches. It was said that the issue was not raised in the election and people did not know about it, and that therefore there must be a referendum. The Foreign Secretary said that, for party political advantage, he tried to raise it. That comes as a surprise, because I thought that the right hon. Gentleman was above that. I and my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) also tried, and we can produce the press releases that we put out. We can produce journalists who were briefed to the point of tedium, but, of course, little was heard about that.

I spent much time repeatedly telling the electorate that the Government were proud of opting out of one of the significant advantages of the Maastricht treaty. During that election campaign, my hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham was quite properly drawing attention to other matters. People were listening to him and, sad to say for my political future, they were not listening to me. The topic was there all the time and has not been suppressed in any way.

Mr. Gould: Will my hon. Friend refresh our memories about how people might have voted if they had taken a view contrary to the view of the leaders of both the major parties? Does he recall people having any option to vote for or against the Maastricht treaty, or were they simply presented with a monolithic position, agreed to by the leadership of all the major parties? For that reason, the matter was never an issue in the general election campaign.

Mr. Robertson: My hon. Friend was in the leadership of the Labour party during that campaign, and that leadership told the people that, if we were returned to power we would ratify the Maastricht treaty. My right hon. Friend the Member for Gorton made that absolutely plain. We would have ratified it, with the social chapter included in it.

The leaderships of the parties were united on a number of other issues. I dare say that that, in a clinical, technical way, denied people the right to vote against such issues. However, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland said, the British people must have drawn some conclusion from the fact that the leaderships of all the parties standing in the election, with the exception of the Ulster Unionists, were in favour of the Maastricht treaty, however imperfect they may have thought it in the detail. They would have drawn a conclusion from that, but to suggest that there was a conspiracy is nonsense.

We are told that public opinion must be the criterion. I agree that pubic opinion is extremely important. However, hardly a single politician in the Committee, if asked to comment on an opinion poll, would not say, if it were on a matter that he thought was contrary to his party's interest, "Ah well, it is only a snapshot, I am interested only in trends, I don't rely on one opinion poll."

A significant number of people want a referendum on Maastricht, but a similar majority would want a referendum on the return of capital punishment, perhaps on the abortion laws, almost certainly on the Sunday trading laws. On a whole series of issues, if people were asked whether they would like a referendum, they would say in almost the same proportion that they would like a referendum. However, if that is to be the principle on which we base the judgments we take, what will there be left for us to do?

I make the point that many others have made in the debate. Those who cry loudest about Parliament handing over sovereignty to Brussels—when we are sharing power with 12 other countries at Brussels, building on that share of sovereignty, making sure that we participate in, and get advantage from, that shared sovereignty—happen also to be those who are most keen to hand over sovereignty, on this and probably many other issues, to the rule of the plebiscite.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mr. Robertson: No, I shall not give way. I have tried to answer many points, but time is moving on.

Sir Roger Moate: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Robertson: The hon. Gentleman has had his chance, and a fairly lengthy chance at that, but I should like to conclude so that others may speak in the debate.

Most of the people—I concede, not all—who are seeking a referendum do so because they want a "no" majority. If they were frank, as some are, they would admit that what drives and motivates them is not just opposition to Maastricht but opposition to the European Community as a whole. So be it: they are entitled to that view. They failed in Parliament in 1972 and in 1976 and in the referendum of 1975, but they are entitled to keep on their campaigning.

The Labour party believes that Britain is in the European Community and should remain there. We believe that Parliament is the place where the issues can be debated, and the scrutiny that the British people expect and deserve can be given to the treaty and all the serious issues that are in it. For that reason, and many of the other reasons that I have enunciated and that have been enunciated by my right hon. and hon. Friends here and elsewhere, we shall oppose new clause 49.

Mr. Michael Lord (Suffolk, Central): It is significant that, as we near the end of the Committee, the previous two speakers—from the Front Benches—addressed us in a way that showed clearly the cosy relationship that the two Front Benches have had throughout the Committee proceedings.

I am not sure what impact my words will have, but it is vital to me to be able to tell the Committee how strongly I feel about this issue. I feel certain that, however well or badly I put my thoughts, this will be my most important contribution in my 10 years in the House and, together with my vote at the end of the debate, it may be the most important thing that I do for as long as I am a Member of Parliament.

The debate is not simply about whether this great House of Commons continues to govern our nation; it is also about how it is governing today and how in touch it is with the people it governs.

The whole sorry tale of the Maastricht treaty began at an intergovernmental conference in Rome in December 1990. As I was one of the delegation from the House at that conference, I suppose that I must, to some extent, bear some responsibility for what resulted from it. What a farce that first intergovernmental conference was! The delegates were supposed to attend as representatives of their countries, not of their political parties, and with reasonably open minds. On arrival, however, we were all placed in party-political groupings and it quickly became clear to me that few open minds were to be seen. It also became clear to me almost as soon as I arrived that the final proposals that the conference would put forward had been decided before it even started. If one asks what influence that conference had on the final proposals, the answer is absolutely none.

Europe can sometimes be very colourful. On the final morning of the conference, we voted for hours on 220 different amendments, all produced on purple paper. I have them with me and I will keep them for ever to remind me of that day. The voting finally finished, one or two of us having voted against the amendments while hundreds voted for them. Everyone seemed very happy, glasses clinked and we departed homewards. If ever the slogan, "Is your journey really necessary?" was applicable, it was to the 1990 intergovernmental conference in Rome.

The purple amendments gave way to the yellow treaty. Of course when we ask, "Why a referendum?" we must remember that the people of this country were not consulted about the drafting of that treaty. They never have been properly consulted since.

Under normal circumstances, I would not advocate a referendum because I believe that it is the duty of Members of Parliament to take decisions on behalf of their constituents and not to thrust those decisions back on their constituents' shoulders. But this is different. The Maastricht treaty will take away from Members of Parliament the right and the ability, fought for and cherished for centuries, to represent and stand up for their constituents in the House. If that power is to be given away or greatly diluted, as it is under the Maastricht treaty, only the British people, individually, can agree to it. The House of Commons cannot give away power, rights and responsibilities which belong not to it, but to the people.

The constant refrain from Ministers has been that some people are in favour of the Maastricht treaty, while others would like to come out of Europe altogether. That statement is one of those quarter truths that have clouded the entire debate. Most people do not fall into one of those two groups; they lie exactly between those two extremes.

During the general election, in common with many other hon. Members, I knocked on many doors. I must confess that the Maastricht treaty was not on the lips of everyone to whom I spoke. When it came up, however, the message I always received, loud and clear, was that people believed in the need for a common market, for which they clearly understood the nation voted in a referendum some years ago. They believed that a common market, or a free trade area, in Europe made a great deal of sense, but they did not want to go beyond that.

There are many good reasons for a referendum on this issue which I will not rehearse because many of them were given earlier.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: My hon. Friend will accept that our right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary made repeated reference to the 1972 treaty of Rome. He said firmly to the Committee that it not only had an economic content but a political one. Is not the reality that the House misled the people into believing that the common market and the treaty of Rome were primarily, if not exclusively, about trade and economic matters and would not in any way impugn or undermine the sovereignty of the country and our Parliament?

I am

Mr. Lord: My hon. Friend makes a good point. The debate has teased out many truths about what has happened over the years in respect of agreements and treaties. If those truths had been made known to the people at the time, I believe that they would have reacted differently.

Ministers often say that the people are not happy about the Maastricht treaty and the present position in Europe because they do not understand the treaty. When the people come to understand fully what has already been given away in their name, we shall see the strongest possible reaction.

There are many good reasons why a referendum should be held. For example, as all the major parties were in favour of the treaty during the general election campaign, the electorate was unable to register its vote against it. The text of the treaty was not available to the general public until some time after the election.

This is too important a matter to be bulldozed through the House of Commons as a face-saving exercise for the Government so as not to upset our European colleagues. Nothing annoys me more than to hear many hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber who are voting for the Bill saying behind the scenes that they want only to get the Bill out of the way and then start negotiations to get the Europe that we want. What humbug! What family, business or organisation would sign a contract in which it did not believe on the basis that on the next day it could enter into new negotiations for a better deal?

Let no one fool himself about the reaction of Delors or others in Europe to the ratification of the treaty. We think that Europe is slowing down and that our voice is being heard, but once the treaty is ratified, Jacques Delors and his colleagues will have seen the process as a minor hiccup on the grand march towards the Europe in which they believe.

A referendum would not undermine parliamentary sovereignty. After all, previous referendums have not done so. If a referendum is properly carried out, it can supplement and enrich democracy and restore people's faith in the system. An excellent editorial in The Times on 25 February showed how a referendum is far from alien to the Conservative tradition. Various leaders have been referred to, including Balfour, Baldwin and Churchill. They all considered and advocated referendums at various times. Parliament is undermined not by the idea of a referendum but by the squalid tactics that have been and are being employed to get the Bill through the House of Commons.

The Europe to which the Maastricht treaty is taking us is a dream of an out-of-touch, elitist group of civil servants and some senior, not to say in other parts of Europe, elderly politicians. It is not a Europe which makes any sense to the people of the United Kingdom. Jacques Delors said after the French referendum that Europe was an elitist venture and only the decision makers needed to be convinced. At the end of March, Willy de Clerc, the leader of the committee that produced an appalling report on rebuilding the Community's image, said that Governments and the Community should stop trying to explain the treaty. To use his words, "It is 'inexplainable'." He added that treaty decisions were far too technical and removed from daily life for people to understand. Should any laws be so incomprehensible? We are faced with a civil servant's dream and an ordinary person's nightmare.

Civil servants and politicians involved in European legislation seem to suffer from schizophrenia. Views depend entirely on which side of the channel an individual is sitting. Directives that seem sensible and communautaire when agreed in the neutral, rarefied and utopian atmosphere of a Brussels committee room or a Strasbourg restaurant become nonsensical when applied to the local factory, the corner shop or the women's institute. It would be funny if they were not doing so much damage.

A referendum campaign would initiate the debate that the nation has so far been denied and would widen the understanding of the treaty. The Danish people seem to manage it, so why cannot we?

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Will my hon. Friend give way on that very point?

Mr. Lord: With respect, I must press on. The hour is late. There is a little more that I want to say and I have waited a long time to say it.

Are we really going to say that our people cannot have a referendum—that their fate must hang on the decision made by the people of Denmark in their referendum? The Irish and French have now held referendums. Are they so much more intelligent and politically aware than our people? I do not think so.

I am one of the Conservative Members who, throughout our debates on the Bill, have been called rebels. It is a label of which I am neither proud nor ashamed. I have never voted against the Government before in the 10 years in which I have been in the House, but this matter is much more important to me than any of the labels that are bandied about. If "rebel" is the correct term for a Member of Parliament who does what he believes to be right in regard to a great issue of the day, I am happy to be associated with former rebels in the Conservative party who also stuck to their guns.

In the 1843 Session of Parliament, Disraeli voted against the Government 10 times. In 1844, he did so seven times. During the passage of the Government of India Bill in the 1930s, Winston Churchill voted against the Bill 30 times in Committee and once on Report. It is interesting tc note that, on at least two occasions, Churchill moved motions to report progress.

Macmillan joined the rebellion against the Government's appeasement policy; and, after a foreign affairs debate in June 1936, he was one of two Tory Members who voted against the Government. A week later, he resigned the Whip. When Anthony Eden resigned in February 1938, he said at the start of his resignation statement:

"there are occasions when strong political convictions must override all other considerations. Of such occasions only the individual himself can be the judge. No man can be the keeper of another man's conscience".

It is interesting to note how little things have changed in the last half century. During the Committee stage of the Government of India Bill in 1935, Winston Churchill wrote to his wife:

"we do very well in the debate but the Government have mobilised 250 of their followers who do not trouble to listen to the debates but march in solidly and vote us down with large majorities usually swelled by the Socialists and always by the Liberals. It is going to be a long weary business".

On 2 March, he wrote to her again:

"The Government's supporters are cowed, resentful and sullen. They keep 250 waiting about in the Libraries and Smoking Rooms to vote us down on every amendment and we have a fighting force of about 50 which holds together with increasing loyalty and conviction."

His letter ended:

"The Divisions go the other way, but we mock at them for being lackeys and slaves".

During this Committee stage, I have heard the best speeches that I have heard since becoming a Member of Parliament. How sad it is that they have all too frequently been made to almost empty Galleries. I believe that the speeches have been so good because, by and large, the hon. Members who have taken part in the debate have understood their subject and cared deeply about it. The Government have won the votes, but they have never won the arguments.

Perhaps the most important point for me so far was raised by my hon. Friend the Member for East Lindsey (Sir P. Tapsell). In a wonderful speech on 24 March, he comprehensively destroyed any credible case for a central bank. His remarks were given added authority by the fact that—I suspect—he knows more about international banking than any other Member of Parliament.

However, it is not my hon. Friend's remarks about banking that I shall remember for many years to come; it is his description of how a colleague of his in the House many years ago, Walter Elliot, had told him that voting for Munich—out of loyalty to Neville Chamberlain—had not only eventually wrecked his political career, but, more important, permanently damaged his self-esteem. He never ceased to reproach himself for his vote as events unfolded. My hon. Friend predicted that, 10 years from now, very few Conservative Members would admit that they had ever supported the Maastricht treaty.

Churchill said, "Trust the people." We have heard that phrase several times today. On this issue, we must not only trust the people; we must explain to them what is at stake and seek their views. We keep talking about open government, but if people really do not understand what we are doing in the House of Commons, they are shut out of the affairs of our nation just as effectively as if a door had been slammed in their face.

Many recent decisions by the Government have raised serious questions about how in touch with the people we are. How tragic it would be if this estrangement were to reach its peak on a matter of such magnitude. It is essential for any Government to keep in touch with the people. We may not think that they need to be consulted, but what happens if they think that they ought to be and they are not? If their views are not sought and if events in Europe go the way that I suspect they will, they will feel cheated and angry.

What, then, will be the repercussions, not just on European issues but on the whole relationship between the nation and its Government? We want more open and more honest government. Why do we not start now? A referendum on this issue could be the turning point, giving back to the people their involvement and rekindling their trust.

I particularly urge the Prime Minister not to allow the responsibility for forcing this dubious treaty on our country to rest entirely on his own shoulders. He has done all that anyone possibly could to keep his word on the Maastricht treaty and to honour his commitment, but it is now almost a year and a half since that commitment was given and so much has changed in the Community and the wider Europe. The world has moved on significantly. The Danes have voted no. There is great anxiety throughout Europe about this treaty and a growing belief in all countries that on this issue leaders are out of touch with their people. Our Prime Minister is entitled to say, "I have done my best, but the whole European scene is now so changed that I feel obliged to recognise the concerns of the British people about this issue and to put the matter to them in a referendum."

The Prime Minister wants a nation at ease with itself. Our nation is not at the moment at ease with itself. It is a nation hypnotised by Europe and frustrated by its inability to act decisively, not just in its own best interests but in the best interests of the other nations of Europe. For a nation to be at ease with itself, it needs to be at ease with its neighbours, and we are not.

There should be no need to enforce co-operation between European allies in a treaty. If they agree on policies, they can act together freely and in their own mutual interest. Forced co-operation and co-ordination, as in the exchange rate mechanism, creates unnecessary pressures which eventually have to be released, one way or the other.

I believe that very few Members of this House of Commons really have their hearts in the Maastricht treaty any more. If that is true, how wrong it would be to foist it on the British people without their consent. I am prepared to admit that I want to see a referendum, not just for the reasons that I gave earlier but because I very much hope and believe that the British people do not want the Maastricht treaty and would vote against it.

I hope that hon. Members who vote against a referendum tonight will at least admit to themselves that they may be voting against a referendum on the Maastricht treaty partly on principle but also because they know that a referendum, if granted, would result in a resounding no.

The House of Commons, established and maintained by sacrifices and traditions for centuries, has to make a historic decision. This issue is said to be an extremely complicated one, but I wonder whether that is really true. Perhaps all great issues are essentially very simple. Perhaps we make them complicated when we do not want to face them. The very simple question that I want the British people to be asked is: "Do you want to be governed by the House of Commons or Brussels?"

This is about our country's independence, integrity and individuality. It is about all those things which, as has already been mentioned in the debate today, pilots in the battle of Britain fought and died for. In its own way, the treaty is a battle for Britain, the big difference being that we, as Members of Parliament, do not have to sacrifice our lives but only to cast our votes. I hope that when hon. Members cast their votes, they will allow the people of this country to say what they want our votes to mean and to stand for in the years to come.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: It is an unusual pleasure to be able to follow speeches by members of the two main Front Benches because in Maastricht debates we have usually heard no senior but junior members of the Front Benches —senior members of the Front Benches have wanted to stay away and not commit themselves to anything in the dead of night. It is interesting that two senior Front Benchers feel so guilty about what is being said in opposing a referendum that they have come to justify it at such length and in such arcane ways.

1.15 am

The Foreign Secretary's speech was interesting. I have always regarded him as an other-worldly figure, possibly a foreigner, in his Loden overcoat about which I heard someone remark, "The last time I saw someone wearing an overcoat like that, I shot him." His speech revealed that he is so other-wordly that he has spent the past six months on another planet. He feels that the people of this country are in favour of the Maastricht treaty and that the overwhelming majority of the Conservative party is in favour of it and opposed to a referendum.

If he feels that, why not put it to the test? Why not put the issue to the people if they think as he believes they do? Instead, he says that we should not have a referendum because we did not have one on the Single European Act which, to people like me, simply means that one should not trust politicans again. They said that the Act changed nothing but subsequently admit that it changed everything so much that we should have had a referendum. The Foreign Secretary even says that the 1975 referendum produced a final verdict. Yet we were positively assured that it had stopped progress towards monetary union and all the things that we are being offered now.

My party's Front Bench spokesman gave a brilliant performance in whipping up support for a referendum. For that reason, I did not want to interrupt him. However, he did not deal with the central argument of those of us who want a referendum. It has nothing to do with the intricate politics of Scottish nationalism or an internal argument in Scotland. I hesitated to intrude on the domestic row. The central point is our belief that, on a matter of basic constitutional change, the people should be consulted. That is what it is about, not a desire to bring down the Government or to do anything else. The people have a right to be consulted.

I thought that the Liberal Front Bench spokesman made the most effective speech of the three Front Bench spokesmen. He made the basic point that the only way to get the treaty settled in and accepted and to get popular consent is to let the people speak. If not, there will be the long whingeing embittering rear-guard action about which the critics of a referendum have complained all along. Refusal will guarantee that the bitter feeling of frustration will be amplified.

If we now refuse the people a referendum, they will justly feel cheated because they will have been cheated. When the consequences of the treaty, in terms of economic deflation and the other problems that we have foreseen, become apparent, their resentment will take the form of a long, whimpering, whingeing bitterness, which will guarantee that neither the treaty nor European union will be acceptable to them and that both will be bitterly resisted.

One cannot make people enthusiastic about Europe by putting them out of a job or, especially, by not telling them that that will be the consequence of the treaty or by not giving them the opportunity to say whether they want to accept it in the first place. A referendum is the only way to get democratic acceptance of the treaty.

I cannot see what the critics of a referendum fear. They have the support of the Front-Bench spokesmen on both sides of the House, and the Foreign Secretary tells us that they have the support of the Conservative party. They have the support of the majority of the Labour party, and the support of the Liberals, the Scottish nationalists, the CBI, the TUC—so they tell us—and of the press and all the rest of the media. They have the support of The Independent and of The Guardian, which believes in "My Europe, right or wrong,"—or, as The Guardian would put it, "My Europe right or wrong." Yet with all that support they still fear that there will not be a majority in favour of Maastricht. That is inconceivable. Their case must be absolutely pathetic if even with all that support they fear that Maastricht will be rejected.

At this stage in the argument I must make a confession. When I used to teach political science—when I was concerned with the theory, before coming here to fail the practicals—I opposed referendums, for two basic reasons. First, I thought that the system as it was worked well and that party government gave us the power to change. I thought that a majority, a mandate, would give a Labour party the power to change the system in this country and make it a fairer society. Secondly, I believed that a referendum, as a conservative device that was opposed to change, would deny us that power. We have to face the fact that a referendum is a conservative device.

Those two reasons for opposing referendums were confirmed by my first experience of a referendum in 1967. In New Zealand I voted in favour of ending the 6 o'clock swill. That was a basic mistake in my life, because the result changed New Zealand society and ruined social habits there. It meant that people were drinking all night instead of going totally berserk and being out of their brains by 7 o'clock, with the rest of the evening to sober up. So my first referendum vote was a basic mistake.

Since then I have changed my view, because the social base on which parties and politics in this country rests is now out of adjustment with the polity in the country. Because the social base has changed we now get, not alternation of parties, not the power to change things, but a prolonged period of dictatorship by the minority. That is the consequence of the change in the system.

There is now a growing gulf between politics, politicians and parties on the one hand, and the people on the other. There is now a class of professional career politicians who want to get on, and one way to get on is to testify one's loyalty to Europe, the source of all blessing, jobs, sinecures and cashflow. Ours becomes a system in which people climb by conforming, and as they do so they get more and more out of touch with the people. That gulf is compounded by the economic difficulties of a country in decline, which mean that politicians cannot deliver the well-being that people ask for.

For all those reasons, there is a gulf between politicians and people, and the people feel resentful. They feel that they are not consulted or listened to. We make that worse if we do not allow them to be consulted on a basic constitutional issue. They should be consulted on constitutional issues, and the Labour party has led the way in doing that. We gave the people the referendum on entry, although it came belatedly in 1975, and we gave the people a referendum on devolution in Scotland and Wales. It went against us, and it was not adequate, but it was Labour party policy to consult the people.

Mr. Salmond: The referendum did not go against you. The people supported it.

Mr. Mitchell: The figure was slightly over 50 per cent., but we did not get the 40 per cent. that we required; it was 32·8 per cent. or something like that. I forget the exact figure. All that I am saying is that we gave the people the referendum; it was Labour party policy, which we all voted for and supported. Why now change our minds? It is clear that there should be a referendum on a constitutional issue.

Mr. Graham: My hon. Friend will know that the Labour party's policy in Scotland is to have a multi-referendum. We are still keen to have one, so we would give the people in Scotland the right to make a decision on a highly complex issue. I say, and I am sure that my hon. Friend agrees, that we shall be insulting the intelligence of the people of Britain if we do not give them a referendum. I do not know which way the people of Britain would vote. However, that is not important. The point is that democracy is important. If it is good for Boris Yeltsin, it is good for other folk.

Mr. Mitchell: I am not sure whether everything that is good for Boris Yeltsin is good for me. I do not take as much of it, if I can put it that way.

The people should be consulted on constitutional issues. Labour has consulted them in the past and there will be a change in their powers over our system of government in respect of their constitutional role. In respect of Maastricht, we cannot make people citizens of a union, with the rights and duties of citizens of a union, without consulting them. We cannot impose on the people the kind of economic framework that we are imposing on them without consulting them.

This basic change is being made by the back door. There is a surge and drive to unity in Europe. However, popular consent cannot be achieved in referendums and there is no intergovernmental agreement. If we had been able to achieve intergovernmental agreement, the CAP would not have survived for as long as it has, still absorbing more than 60 per cent. of Europe's spending. As popular consent and intergovernmental agreement cannot be achieved, the idea is to impose unity from the top down through monetary union which is the core of the Maastricht treaty.

As a result, we will be committed to re-enter the ERM and to monetary union. As part of the treaty we are committed to hand over the powers that a Labour Government, or any sensible Government, would need to revive the declining economy of this country and to widen our industrial base. That includes power over interest rates, over the exchange rate, over borrowing and over the money supply.

All those tools will have been handed over. We do not have the ability or the right to hand over to another entity those powers which rightly belong to the people and the Government whom they elect, without consulting the people. However, that is what we are being asked to do. It is a mistake to create a Europe in which central bankers rule OK and untrammelled without any control over their decisions without consulting the people. We should not hand over those weapons.

At one stage in the debate, we asked what a Labour Government would do, when they took office in 1996 with a mandate to rebuild the economy, to fight rising unemployment and to widen the industrial base, if all those powers had been handed over. The Opposition Front Bench spokesman said, "Oh well, we'll go to Brussels and negotiate." We will not actually do anything because we cannot do anything, so we end up with the spectacle of a Labour Government—a Labour Government—hiring taxis to scuttle around Brussels to ask permission to stop making their own people redundant as consequence of the treaty.

It has been said that this is not irrevocable, but it is. It is absolutely irrevocable. Once the powers are gone, they are gone and that is it. It has also been said that we do not need to consult the people in a referendum because they have already been consulted in the election. That is totally bogus. All the parties presented the same policies on Maastricht. There was no choice for people in most constituencies who were against the treaty. What were they to do? Were they to abdicate the hope of change or were they to concentrate simply on the issue of Maastricht? It is totally unrealistic to claim that the election decided the issue.

It is also unrealistic to say that Parliament should decide the issue because there is effectively a conspiracy between the parties.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Mitchell: Yes, of course. I am sorry, I did not see the hon. Gentleman rising.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Will the hon. Gentleman avoid misleading his Front Bench about the powers after the Maastricht treaty has been passed? Does he accept that the power available to a possible future Labour Government to go to Brussels and plead for certain changes in policy will be removed totally when the central bank takes over? Will the hon. Gentleman consider page 91 of the treaty where he will see that, after the central bank takes over, no Labour Government, Conservative Government or even a Liberal Democrat Government will be allowed to make representations or a telephone call to the bank, or even send it a letter? Does he appreciate that it is not simply the abolition of freedom, democracy, socialism or conservatism? Basically, it means that there is not much point in voting for anyone at the next election.

1.30 pm

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman is correct. Our only power will be not to send letters to the bank but to receive letters from it. Presumably, we will be charged 30 million ecu for each letter telling us that we are in overdraft. The hon. Gentleman reinforces my point.

Government Front Bench and Labour Front Bench spokesmen are saying the same thing: the treaty is not perfect; it will not work well; time has passed it by; it is probably dead and it is unable to be implemented but we must still pass it as a testimony to our commitment to the Community. Our electors—the people—do not share that commitment, but we must testify to it to Europe. For the first time, the Liberals have tasted power——

Royal Prerogative

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Arbuthnot.]

2.20 am

Mr. John Garrett (Norwich, South): I wish briefly to explore the scope and limits of the royal prerogative and its present-day usage by the Government, and to put a number of questions to the hapless Minister who has the duty of answering the debate. I want to ask him about the profoundly undemocratic practice that allows a Government to act with royal absolutism.

As I understand it, the royal prerogative denotes what remains of the monarch's power to legislate without the authority of Parliament. As the monarch acts on the advice of Government, the procedure enables a Government to produce primary legislation without parliamentary consent—legislation which, as was made clear by the GCHQ case, may not be challenged in the courts.

Blackstone's 18th century "Commentaries on the Laws of England" referred to the prerogative as

"that special pre-eminence which the King hath, over and above all other persons, and out of the course of the common law, in right of his royal dignity"— an arrangement that Blackstone described as

"in its nature singular and eccentrical".

In the past 10 years, some 1,400 orders have been made under the prerogative. Ministers usually imply that such orders relate to such quaint and innocuous matters as the grant and amendment of charters, and the appointment of visitors and governors of universities. Many do; but the prerogative is also applied to important international obligations and, in particular, to citizens' rights.

The prerogative is used for the making of international treaties—which may be why from time to time, when it suits them, Ministers tell us that any Commons vote on the Maastricht treaty can be disregarded by the Government. It is also used for the declaration of war and blockade. The Government used it to commit British military forces in the Gulf war—prompting my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) to observe:

"this is the first time in the history of this country that British troops have been sent into battle under foreign command, using the royal prerogative of war-making to do so, without the House having had an opportunity to express its view on any motion other than that we adjourn".—[Official Report, 14 January 1991; Vol. 183, c. 616.]

My right hon. Friend contrasted the handling of the matter in the House of Commons with the way in which both Houses of the United States Congress had debated and voted on a resolution on military action.

The Government used prerogative powers to enable the United States military to bomb Libya from bases in England. That was a matter of awesome political importance, in which—once again—the House of Commons had no status. The prerogative is used for the control and organisation of the armed forces. In the matter of civil liberties, under the royal prerogative the Government can refuse or withdraw a passport, and can forbid a citizen to leave the country. There is no legal obligation on the Government to provide a passport, which I should have thought was a fundamental right of any citizen of this country.

Jury vetting guidelines and telephone tapping are authorised by royal prerogative, apparently under an ancient royal right to intercept communications between subjects. The criminal injuries compensation scheme was established by royal prerogative without statutory authority.

Most notoriously in recent times, the royal prerogative was used in 1984 to ban from membership of trades unions the staff of the Government intelligence establishment GCHQ. In a subsequent court case on that subject, the Government argued successfully that not only were their powers not open to judicial review, but that instructions given in exercising them enjoyed the same immunity. This situation derived from the fact that the legal relationship between the Crown and civil or Crown servants is governed by the prerogative, and is unlike any normal contractual relationship between employer and employee. That explains why we in this country have yet to resolve the crucial issue whether the duty of a civil servant is to the national interest or to the Government, and why there is no protection for whistleblowers in the civil service.

In any other country, the civil service would be regulated by a civil service Act that set out in law the rights, duties and constitutional position of civil servants. Here, the civil service is subject to the monarchical whims of some Minister. My first question to the Minister is, why cannot the civil service be governed by a civil service Act, and are the Clerks of this House also governed by the royal prerogative, rather than by legislation passed by the House?

The royal prerogative is used for literally thousands of appointments in the public sector, and it is the fount of Government patronage. In 1965, Lord Reid observed:

"it is not easy to discover and decide the law relating to the royal prerogative and the consequences of its exercise."

He noted that there had been "practically no authority" on the matter since 1688.

The most extensive discussion recently of the royal prerogative was by Professor Colin Munro in a publication in 1987. He wrote:

"In practice . . . the supervision of prerogative powers does seem to be attended by greater than average difficulty. The very nature of these powers makes them less readily subject to challenge."

He tells us that the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration, or ombudsman, has no power to examine decisions under the royal prerogative and says:

"the exercise of prerogatives by the Attorney General may not be reviewed."

He also says:

"The correlation between the matters excluded from the Commissioner's jurisdiction and the spheres of activity in which governments exercise prerogative powers is striking."

We also learn from Munro that the manner of the exercise of prerogative powers lies outside the scope of judicial review, so we are inevitably brought to the conclusion that a British subject may be deported, or refused a passport, or have his or her telephone tapped or mail opened by the state without legislative authority, and that neither Parliament nor the judiciary is entitled to examine the matter.

The Minister will also know that subsidiary powers flow from the royal prerogative. The Crown's right to have admissible evidence withheld from a court when it claims that the public interest so demands has been known as Crown privilege although nowadays its existence is disputed. Does it exist, I ask the Minister, and what does it cover? Is there still such a concept in British law as Crown privilege which exempts the Crown from justiciable matters?

Crown immunity is certainly alive and kicking. The sovereign—and, therefore, the Government—still enjoy a number of immunities derived from the ancient "prerogative of perfection"—that is, "The King can do no wrong." What it means today is that Government Departments and many public bodies are not bound by a huge range of protective legislation, such as health and safety, food hygiene laws and planning and environmental regulations. I understand that that legislation does not, for example, protect those who work in the parliamentary precincts, let alone the hundreds of thousands of people in other public organisations. Therefore, to be employed in a public building means that one cannot be protected by a wide range of legislation.

Munro concludes:

"Behind the phrase "royal prerogative" lie hidden some issues of great constitutional importance, which are insufficiently recognised."

It seems that the prerogative could be dispensed with almost entirely. The civil service and the military could be governed by Acts of Parliament, as in other countries. Telephone tapping, mail interception, deportation and entitlement to travel should be justiciable. Senior public appointments could be supervised by Select Committee. The Speaker could take over some prerogative powers, such as the dissolution of Parliament and the invitation to the leader of the party with the largest majority to form a Government.

In a recent written answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen), the Prime Minister said:

"It is for individual Ministers to decide on a particular occasion whether and how to report to Parliament on the exercise of prerogative powers."—[Official Report, 1 March 1993; Vol. 220, c. 19.]

It is nothing less than a constitutional outrage that Ministers should decide whether to withhold matters from Parliament. It should be the Speaker's job to decide how the exercise of prerogative powers should be reported to the House. It should also be up to the Speaker to judge whether a Minister should answer to the House for the use of extra-statutory power.

The royal prerogative is an anachronism—an example of the overweening and authoritarian power of Government over Parliament. In truth, the purpose of our Parliament is to provide a Government and to scrutinise their actions and decisions, but only to the extent that Government will allow. That is not good enough. The royal prerogative is a chilling manifestation of the way in which our democracy is deficient, and it should be mapped by the Select Committee on Procedure as soon as possible, and then largely ended.

I am keen to hear what the Minister has to say about the boundaries of the royal prerogative and the extent to which as, I hope, a democrat he thinks that government by proclamation and diktat could be replaced by a proper legislative process.

2.32 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Charles Wardle): The hon. Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Garrett) has shown interest in constitutional matters for 25 years. I know that because I have read the flyleaf of his book. I mean no disrespect in mentioning it. In the final paragraph on page 65, he uses the same quotation from the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn).

Tonight the hon. Gentleman has raised the question of ministerial exercise of powers under the royal prerogative and implied that there is some abuse in the exercise of such powers. That is not the case, as I shall prove. I shall attempt to deal with most of the points that he has raised but, if there are any that I have not dealt with by the end of the debate, I shall write to him.

As the hon. Gentleman knows, the history of the royal prerogative goes back to the middle ages, when the king was both feudal lord and head of the kingdom. He therefore had all the rights of a feudal lord and certain exceptional rights. The king could not be sued in his own courts and, in addition, had powers to defend the realm against enemies and an "undefined residue of power which he might use for the public good."

It was the "undefined residue" of prerogative power which caused disputes when claimed by the Stuarts. Lawyers claimed then that there was a fundamental distinction between the ordinary and the absolute prerogative; the ordinary prerogative being those functions the king would exercise only in defined ways, which involved no element of discretion. Thus the king could dispense justice only through the judges, and make laws through Parliament.

The absolute prerogative, on the other hand, the king's discretionary powers, were the powers on which Charles I relied in seeking to govern without Parliament. The conflict was resolved after the execution of one king and the expulsion of another.

However, the problem still remained. It was resolved in two stages. The Bill of Rights of 1689 declared illegal certain specific uses and abuses of the prerogative, and since then there has been a growth in responsible government and the establishment of a constitutional monarchy. It became established that certain prerogative powers could be exercised only through and on the advice of Ministers responsible to Parliament.

The royal prerogative has been described by a distinguished constitutional writer as an "attenuated remnant". The rights of Parliament to limit the prerogative are unrestricted. It is a one-way street. By definition, the scope of the prerogative is not greater now than it was in, say, 1979, and I have seen no convincing demonstration that the use of the prerogative is significantly different, or that practice in reporting such use to Parliament has changed.

It is simply not the case that the royal prerogative has to a large extent got stuck in Whitehall, as the hon. Gentleman implied. The legislative authority of Parliament to limit prerogative powers is unlimited, and the extent of the prerogative has been steadily reduced over the years and cannot be increased. Such prerogative powers are residual and may be restricted or abolished by statute, and even where statute overlaps prerogative powers, the prerogative power falls into abeyance and the Crown from then on uses the statutory rather than the prerogative power.

The hon. Gentleman claims that the prerogative has been used some 1,400 times in the past 10 years and asks why, implying that the Government have abused their powers. The same powers have of course been used, in much the same way, by previous, Labour, Governments; indeed, they have been used by successive Governments.

The hon. Gentleman cites in particular the declaration of war, the making of international treaties, and judicial and civil service appointments. But it is inconceivable that any Government would declare war without being confident that they would command parliamentary support. The money needed to sustain the war could be voted only by Parliament.

No sensible Government would take the risk of declaring war without being assured of parliamentary support. The events of 1939 and 1940, and the way in which this country fought that war as a democracy, changing the Prime Minister as a direct result of an expression of the feeling of the House, provide evidence of the flexibility and strength of our unwritten constitution.

Treaties are published under the Ponsonby rule. It has been in use for nearly 70 years, including periods when the Labour party was in power. It applies to all treaties that are signed subject to ratification, and was born out of the desire to give Parliament the opportunity to examine such treaties before they were ratified. They include those which established NATO and the Western European Union, and more recently the Antarctic treaty, the Montreal protocol on the control of CFCs, and so on.

The value of the procedure, and its effectiveness for allowing an opportunity for parliamentary scrutiny and debate before ratification, is thus well proven, and has been accepted by successive Governments. Where a treaty cannot be ratified without making a change to domestic law, the full Bill procedure is required for that change to be made, as Members will be well aware from the debates on the Maastricht treaty, which is surely the most widely debated and closely analysed of any international treaty in recent memory.

This country is rightly proud of the political neutrality of its civil service and of the independence of its judiciary. Those would not necessarily be strengthened if Parliament was involved in the appointments process. Judicial appointments are made either by a responsible Minister, as in the case of the Lord Chancellor, or, as in the case of the senior judiciary, by the Queen on the advice of the Prime Minister. In the case of both civil service and judicial appointments, Ministers are accountable to Parliament through a substantive motion. The Civil Service Commission upholds and oversees the principle of appointment on merit through fair and open competition.

The hon. Gentleman also questioned the use of the prerogative in the issue and refusal of passport facilities. Under the present system, United Kingdom passports are issued at the discretion of my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, exercising the royal prerogative.

In practice, refusal of passport facilities to United Kingdom nationals is confined to certain well defined cateories, of which Parliament has been informed from time to time. Those are necessary in order to maintain the principle of discretion and to prevent it from being prejudiced by the criticism of arbitrary restriction of travel, which is created when a passport is refused.

Although the issue of passports is a discretionary power under the royal prerogative, it is as constrained as any statutory power might be, and the exercise of the discretion may be reviewed by the courts. The system has worked well, and it has been generally accepted that, under successive Administrations, that exercise of the royal prerogative has not been abused.

Implicit in what the hon. Gentleman says is the notion that Governments are somehow secretive. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster is leading a review of unnecessary secrecy, and the Government will be publishing a White Paper in the summer. However, I am not convinced that a charge of secretiveness about the use of the prerogative can be made to stick. The hon. Gentleman may ask why, if we are that open, we do not write down what all the prerogatives are.

As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister made clear in the written answer to the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen), the relationship between statutory powers and prerogative powers can be very complex, especially if the wider definition of the prerogative to which I referred earlier is used, and it would be impracticable to list all the occasions when action was taken under the prerogative. For example, every time a passport is issued, it is in fact an exercise of the prerogative. It would have been just as difficult to enumerate every action taken under statutory authority. There is very eminent authority for this view in Wade and Bradley on constitutional and administrative law. The 10th edition states:

> "Because of the diverse subjects covered by the prerogative, and because of the uncertainty of the law in many instances when an ancient power has not been used in modern times, it is not possible to give a comprehensive catalogue of prerogative powers".

The scope of Orders in Council approved under the prerogative, on the other hand, is narrow. Most orders are made in exercise of statutory powers—that is, under powers delegated by Parliament. Prerogative orders consist essentially of: first, those recording the appointment or swearing of new Privy Councillors; secondly, and the largest number, those granting royal charters or approving changes to existing charters, which are made on the submission of the bodies themselves; thirdly, those directing the affixing of the great seal to proclamations —for example, proroguing or dissolving Parliament; and fourthly, those making certain appointments such as governors of the BBC.

Those orders represent less than half the total made by the Queen in Council. The remainder are made under statutory powers, and are subject to such parliamentary procedures as are specified in the relevant Acts. They are in exercise of a delegated authority to legislate given by Parliament, not an expression of the prerogative at all.

The hon. Gentleman sees Crown immunity as an aspect of the prerogative. But the Government's policy on Crown immunity, as set out in the "Citizen's Charter" White Paper which deals with services to the public by Departments and Crown bodies, is to ensure that those bodies are not shielded from obligations placed upon others. That is consistent with the progressive removal of immunities from the health service. It is also consistent with the approach taken in the Food Safety Act 1990, which exposed the Crown to inspection and enforcement procedures, but not to criminal prosecution. A similar approach was followed in the Environmental Protection Act 1990.

The Government gave a commitment in the "Citizen's Charter" White Paper that the same approach would be followed in similar future legislation, retaining immunities only for special reasons, such as the protection of national security.

At this point, I return to the hon. Gentleman's remarks about GCHQ. The Government's decision to remove the right of GCHQ staff to be members of the national civil service unions was taken because industrial disruption of GCHQ had been used by the national unions to put pressure on the Government in national civil service disputes. Between 1979 and 1981, 10,000 man days were lost disrupting an organisation whose continuous operation is vital to national security.

The Government's objectives remain unchanged since 1984. However, there have been discussions with the Council of Civil Service Unions to look for an alternative solution that would meet the concerns of all parties. The exercise of prerogative powers is subject to judicial review and I recommend that the hon. Gentleman reads the judgment of Lord Scarman in the GCHQ case. In general, if the question at issue is justiciable, the prerogative function will be subject to judicial review.

So the approach is a progressive one. Opportunities are being taken as they arise to bring the Crown within regulatory provisions applying to other bodies. Where the Crown is not at present bound by existing requirements, Crown bodies are expected to comply as though requirements applied to them whenever this is appropriate and practicable.

In any parliamentary democracy, the Government must not be above the law and are subject to parliamentary scrutiny. It is open to Parliament to restrict the prerogative powers exercised by Ministers further, if it wishes to do so, by introducing new Acts of Parliament. However, there is no sensible option of a blanket approach, as the hon. Gentleman would like to see. The case must be made and considered specifically, and in each area.

Mr. Garrett: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Wardle: I have finished.

Mr. Garrett: The Minister trots out weasel words about the Government being able to remove prerogative powers as though it was democratic.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. We have a slight procedural difficulty. The Minister having sat down, the hon. Member cannot have a second bite at the cherry.

Mr. Garrett: I thought he had given way.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I realise that. It then became clear that he had not.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

NORTHERN IRELAND

Acute Hospital Services (Eastern Board Area)

1. Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment he has made of the manner of consultation by the Eastern health and social services board in respect of its document statement of intent for general acute hospital services within the Eastern board area.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Jeremy Hanley): As the hon. Gentleman is aware, the Eastern health and social services board is currently consulting on its "Statement of Intent for General Acute Hospital Services" and this process is due to end on 14 May. I understand that the board is making strenuous efforts to consult as widely as possible, and it is engaged in an intensive programme of meetings with public representatives and local communities.

Mr. McGrady: Is the Minister aware that many of the delegations to the Eastern health and social services board have been refused explanations of the terminology of the statement of intent on such important factors as split-site operations, midwifery-led obstetrics, intermediate and day surgical procedures, accident and emergency provision services and consultant staffing? If the board is unable to clarify to delegations what those terms mean, how can the Minister say that that is consultation? Will he intervene to ensure that people's statutory right to consultation is properly executed and fulfilled?

Mr. Hanley: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for bringing that matter to my attention. It is always open to anybody who is unsatisfied with the avenues of consultation to write to my noble Friend Lord Arran, the Minister with responsibility for health and social services in Northern Ireland, and let him know of their dissatisfaction. The consultation process will end on 14 May and the board will have until the end of July to make its recommendations. There will then be further public consultation, when people can put questions directly to my noble Friend and I hope that they will take every opportunity to do so.

Mr. Peter Robinson: Is the Minister aware that there is considerable concern throughout the area of the Eastern health and social services board about the proposed changes? Will he therefore ensure that the suggested consultation is widespread and includes the people themselves, so that those such as my constituents the Costello family can give their view on the services being handed out by the board? Is the Minister aware that it took one hour and five minutes for a cardiac ambulance to arrive 20 minutes after Mr. Costello had died? Will the Minister look into that matter and examine the services provided by the board as they are thoroughly inadequate and need to be reviewed and improved?

Mr. Hanley: The hon. Gentleman refers to a most distressing case which I read about yesterday in the Belfast Newsletter. The hon. Gentleman has written to my noble Friend about the case. I assure him that the Ulster, North

Down and Ards hospital health and social services trust is investigating the matter. Lord Arran will write to the hon. Gentleman as soon as those researches have been completed.

Rev. Martin Smyth: Does the Minister share the concern of delegations to the board, who have described it as a dialogue with the deaf? That may be an insult to the deaf community. Does the Minister accept that if the board sets down criteria for judgment and then moves away from those criteria, it has moved the goalposts? Will he ask the board to refrain from implementing the suggestions on maternity provision in the board's area until the Department's new working party has made its recommendations?

Mr. Hanley: Again, all that I can say is that my information is that the board is carrying out its responsibilities conscientiously. If the hon. Gentleman has any particular complaints, he should address them to my noble Friend. I have nothing to add to the answer that I gave earlier as to the further consultation process which is available.

Cohesion Funds

2. Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the impact on jobs in Northern Ireland of the proposed distribution of EC cohesion funding.

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. Michael Mates): The United Kingdom and, therefore, Northern Ireland does not qualify for assistance from the cohesion fund agreed at Maastricht. However, the retention of objective 1 status, as agreed at Edinburgh, for the next round of funding will ensure that Northern Ireland continues to benefit substantially from the three structural funds that are the main instruments for strengthening cohesion throughout the Community.

The allocation of the structural funds is currently under negotiation and it will be some months before decisions will be made. It is therefore not possible at this stage to quantify the impact on jobs.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Does it not seem desperately unfair to the people of Northern Ireland that the EC proposes to provide about £1,000 million over six years for the Republic of Ireland and not one penny for Northern Ireland? Does the Minister accept that employers in ports and other transport institutions in Northern Ireland cannot see the logic of a Conservative Government's giving their cash to provide jobs in the Republic of Ireland when the only effect will be to destroy jobs in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Mates: On the contrary, any money that comes into the island tends to help the already fast-moving experience of co-operation between north and south in trade and business and in the general flow of goods across the border. It is not true to suggest, as my hon. Friend does, that not one penny of funds is coming to Northern Ireland. Many millions of pounds are coming into Northern Ireland, but under arrangements other than the cohesion fund, which is available to only four members of the Community.

Mr Hume: Does the Minister agree that, as the cohesion fund was set up under his Government's presidency, the exclusion of Northern Ireland constitutes extreme neglect? As Northern Ireland is an objective 1 region, which means that it has been designated as one of the poorest regions in the European Community, as the cohesion fund is specifically for transport and the environment, and as Northern Ireland has the same offshore problems involving transport and the environment as the Republic of Ireland, does the Minister not think that we should have been treated exactly the same and does he think that he can correct that serious neglect on the part of whoever represented the Government when the fund was set up?

Mr. Mates: The hon. Gentleman suffers under the misapprehension that the cohesion fund is available to the poorer regions of the Community, whereas in fact it is available only to the poorer countries. There are other funds available to poor regions, and objective 1 status, which the Government won at Edinburgh last November, is a considerable improvement. For as long as Northern Ireland remains part of the United Kingdom, it has to take the gains and losses of that membership.

Mr. Hunter: With regard to developments that have an impact on jobs in Northern Ireland, is my hon. Friend in a position to give us further details about the training centres and the market testing of those centres? Presumably those would have a positive impact on jobs in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Mates: It is too early for me to be able to give my hon. Friend any details about that. We have not yet heard what funds will be provided in this round, but as a result of the previous funds available from the Community many, many jobs were created in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Stott: The Minister will be aware that the European Community has financed many cross-border initiatives by using the cohesion fund and objective 1 status funds. Does he agree with me and with Dr. Quigley, the chairman of the Ulster Bank, that the present definition of "cross-border" is too narrow? The relevant geographical area in the south has usually been considered to include only the counties contiguous with the north. Should not the term "cross-border" be redefined to embrace the totality of economic relationships within the island, and should not the EC regard the island economy as a whole as the relevant entity and direct its attention to the needs of that economic area?

Mr. Mates: I fully agree with what the hon. Gentleman says, and we are working hard to increase co-operation. I have made some proposals to my colleagues in the Government of the Republic that when we go to Brussels to seek to improve some of the arrangements we should go together and speak for the whole island. I very much hope that they will respond to those proposals.

Rev. William McCrea: Is not the Minister really saying to the people of Northern Ireland that the Government advise that we would be far better as part of one united Ireland rather than as part of the United Kingdom? They always try to equate or link us with the Irish Republic. For example, a few days ago when we were pleading for more money for potato farmers and money was available in the south of Ireland, they said, "Ah, but if you were all one you would get the money." Surely that is skulduggery at the highest level.

Mr. Mates: I think "skulduggery" might be a bit of poetic licence. The hon. Gentleman is looking at this one fund in isolation. If it is looked at in isolation, it has to be said that the Republic gains more than we in the United Kingdom gain, because we are not eligible for it. The hon. Gentleman should look at all the other advantages that membership of the United Kingdom conveys on Northern Ireland. The totality of the advantages should be put together and then put to the majority in Northern Ireland for them to decide how they want to live.

Glass-fronted Fires

3. Mr. Clifford Forsythe: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many complaints have been reported in the past year regarding glass-fronted fires in Housing Executive dwellings.

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. Robert Atkins): This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, but I understand from the chief executive that between 1 April 1992 and 31 March 1993 there were approximately 35,200 requests for repairs to glass-fronted fires in Executive dwellings. Over 97 per cent. were of a minor nature, such as a cracked or broken pane of glass.

Mr. Forsythe: In view of the great concern about those appliances and their flues and the fear that many tenants, particularly the elderly, have about them, will the Minister take the initiative and set up a committee or a consultative group—to include members of his Department, the Housing Executive, the manufacturers of the appliances and any other interested parties who have the expertise —to sort out this problem once and for all? Will the Minister give an assurance that he will do that?

Mr. Atkins: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for asking the question in the way he has. I know that he has given a great deal of attention to this problem over some years. The Housing Executive is responsible in the first instance. It has told me that it is aware of the concerns and is doing all that it can to ensure that proper training in the use of the fires is given, and that tenants understand what they are required to do to keep the equipment efficient throughout its lifetime. I shall, of course, communicate the hon. Gentleman's concern to the Housing Executive.

Dr. Hendron: With regard to glass-fronted fires and the fumes—including carbon monoxide—that can be associated with them, will the Secretary of State make a statement detailing the number of people in my constituency and elsewhere in Northern Ireland who, in the past 10 years, have taken the Northern Ireland Housing Executive to court on the ground of damage to their health, including the number of cases that were successful or settled out of court? A number of people in Northern Ireland have died as a direct result of the fires—one recently in the constituency of Newry and Armagh—and probably many hundreds more have died as an indirect result of the fumes, even though the words "due to glass-fronted fire" were not on the death certificate.

Mr. Atkins: I think that the hon. Gentleman would be astonished if I were able to give the answer on the Floor of the House. I will ascertain the answer and write to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Budgen: On a previous occasion when a question of this sort was asked in the House, I suggested that what was required in Northern Ireland was not constitutional arrangements by which America or the south was invited to offer impertinent advice, but that the sooner the Government got on with instituting a proper system of local government in Northern Ireland the better. I recollect that on that occasion the Secretary of State nodded in agreement. What is happening about that?

Mr. Atkins: My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State has heard my hon. Friend's question and will doubtless find ways to tell my hon. Friend exactly what is going on.

Water Privatisation

4. Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what investigations he has carried out into alternatives to water privatisation in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: As always in such circumstances, I have considered a number of options for the future of water. Nevertheless, the Government remain committed to water privatisation as soon as practicable. It was originally anticipated for 1995-96, but our financial advisers suggest that some technical problems which have to be addressed will delay it beyond the lifetime of this Parliament.

Mr. Beggs: I welcome the announcement that, albeit for technical reasons, water in Northern Ireland will not be privatised during the life of this Government. That can only lead us to anticipate the next Government and the assurance that the Labour party has already given that it will not be privatising water.

In addition to those technical problems, however, to what extent did my initiative on behalf of the Ulster Unionists—which gained the support of all Northern Ireland Members, MEPs and district councillors in opposition to the proposals—and the recognition of the growing number of disconnections and the hardship and threats to health caused by those disconnections in England and Wales affect the proposals?

Mr. Atkins: There is no secret about the technical reasons——

Ms Short: What are they, then?

Mr. Atkins: If the hon. Lady will wait, I shall tell her. When my hon. Friend the Minister of State replied to a debate on an earlier occasion, he was not able to give the details then because there were other matters in hand that he was addressing. There are, however, three reasons.

First, there is a long overdue reform of the charging procedure for Northern Ireland. As the hon. Member for Antrim, East (Mr. Beggs) will understand, there is concern that some people are paying either too much or not enough and the balance must be redressed.

Secondly, we are under pressure from the EC in respect of directives on the purity and quality of water. That will cost some £350 million to £500 million which at present will be found by the taxpayers. I am sure that the hon.

Member for Antrim, East and other Northern Ireland Members will recognise that that will be a substantial burden on taxpayers in Northern Ireland.

Thirdly, it is certainly the case that I and my hon. Friends on the Government Front Bench would want, if possible, to be able to float water privatisation rather than for it to be a straight sale, simply because that would give people the opportunity to buy shares as they have been able to do in other successful privatisations, such as Shorts, Harland and Wolff and, currently, Northern Ireland Electricity. Although there was opposition to those privatisations, they turned out to be successful.

Several hon. Members rose——

Madam Speaker: Order. We do not want ministerial statements. I should be much happier if we could have brisker questions and brisker answers so that we may make progress.

Mr. Allason: When my hon. Friend deliberates on water privatisation, and bearing in mind his reference a moment ago to the £500 million cost of the EC water purity directives, will he also consider the fact that that kind of investment by the taxpayer was not made when South West Water was privatised? When my hon. Friend considers water privatisation, will he bear in mind the fact that daft European directives can cost an enormous amount of money, not just to the taxpayer? Particularly in the south-west of England, it is our bitter experience that it has been a huge cost to the water charge payers.

Mr. Atkins: I apologise for the length of my previous answer, but I was asked for the technical reasons and I had to spell them out.

The answer to my hon. Friend's question is quite simply that I will draw it to the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, who is responsible for those matters in England. Therefore, I cannot really be asked to comment any further.

Mr. William O'Brien: In view of the reply given to the hon. Member for Antrim, East (Mr. Beggs), will the Minister explain to the House what is happening to the £10 million allocated for the investigation into the privatisation of water in Northern Ireland? How much has been spent on the consultants appointed by the Minister's Department and how much is left in the fund? Will he agree to channel that money into other causes in Northern Ireland to improve the quality of life of the people—in particular, the bypass of the township of Omagh in County Tyrone?

Mr. Atkins: The hon. Gentleman is right to raise that point. It is worth reminding the House, however, that if one enters into any project, including a privatisation project, it is necessary to have specialised technical advice. These days, that costs money. If we had not obtained that specialised advice, we would be open to legitimate criticism from Opposition Members and others. In terms of the costs expended, I believe that that is value for money. Clearly, however, we have to spend more on investment projects such as those asked for by the hon. Gentleman. The kind of money to which I referred, for example, in respect of the water quality directives from the EC, will require expenditure of up to £500 million. That is a lot of money which will have to be found by the taxpayer. That is why we need private sector involvement.

Non-denominational Schools

5. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what representations he has received about non-denominational schools.

Mr. Hanley: While many schools could be included in a strict definition of the term "non-denominational", I understand that my hon. Friend is specifically interested in the integrated schools. I am pleased to report that the continued growth in the integrated schools sector is impressive. I had the opportunity to discuss developments with representatives of the Northern Ireland Council for Integrated Education during my visit to its offices recently.

Mr. Marshall: Does my hon. Friend accept that, important as denominational schools may be, in the specific circumstances in Northern Ireland it is wise that children of all denominations should be taught in the same schools? If children grow up together, learn together and play together, they will not become loud-mouthed bigots when they grow up. How many children are currently educated in integrated schools in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Hanley: At present, there are 14 integrated primary schools and four integrated secondary schools in Northern Ireland, and there are three more in the pipeline. Those schools teach just over 3,300 pupils.

Integrated schools have a significant part to play in helping to overcome community divisions. However, I do not believe that that implies that other schools—after all, we equally respect the right of parents to choose any school for their children—are in some way sectarian merely because they happen to be from one denomination. All schools are actively promoting the cross-curricular themes of education for mutual understanding and cultural heritage. That is a formal part of the Northern Ireland curriculum. More than one third of schools are participating in joint activities through the cross-community contact programme.

Mr. A. Cecil Walker: Will the Minister ensure that controlled schools are treated on an equal basis with maintained schools? Will he give careful consideration to a recent statement by the leader of the Northern Ireland Anglican Church about a council for controlled schools, to be treated on an equal basis with that for Roman Catholic maintained schools?

Mr. Hanley: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that there is currently under way, after consultation, a review of the education administration in Northern Ireland, so the latter issue that he raised will naturally be considered. On the other point, the answer is that such schools have parity in terms or capital grants and individual payments of expenses once they have been set up.

Mr. Beggs: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. An hon. Member has referred to people who are not educated in integrated schools as "loud-mouthed bigots". I put it to you that the hon. Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) should withdraw his remarks.

Madam Speaker: Order. That is hardly a point of order for me. If the hon. Gentleman has a point of order, I will take it at the appropriate time.

Arts Council for Northern Ireland

6. Mr. Hague: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has to reform the Arts Council for Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: On 30 March, I made a statement announcing the Government's decision to appoint a new Arts Council for Northern Ireland on a statutory basis. The chairman of the new body will be Mr. Donnell Deeny QC, and I have invited suggestions for membership. I have arranged for copies of my statement to be placed in the Library of the House of Commons.

Mr. Hague: Can my hon. Friend confirm that Government support for expenditure on the arts has risen considerably in recent years in Northern Ireland, as in the rest of the country? Therefore, is it not right that the Arts Council for Northern Ireland should be fully accountable to Parliament? Will my hon. Friend complement that by ensuring that there are links with district authorities so that there is also a local influence?

Mr. Hanley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. Expenditure on the arts in Northern Ireland has increased considerably in recent years. Following the recent announcement of an extra £300,000 at the end of the last financial year, we almost have parity per capita with Great Britain. My hon. Friend is right: because of extra expenditure, extra revenue and the proceeds that could flow from the national lottery, it is right that the Arts Council for Northern Ireland should be accountable to Parliament.

I pay a tribute to Professor Radford and the existing council, and also to Clive Priestley who wrote the report on which the new council is based. It is right that we should have people who are properly qualified to carry out the role. In no way does that denigrate the existing qualities of the council. It is also vital that district councils should have a role. I am therefore considering making it statutory that the new Arts Council for Northern Ireland shall deal with district councils in a forum in which at least one person from each council is represented and which is consulted at least annually. My hon. Friend is absolutely right: we need a balance between experience and consultation with

Mr. John D. Taylor: Is the Minister aware that in the past few years there has been increasing anxiety across the community in Northern Ireland that there is an imbalance of interest in the Arts Council and in particular that it does not give sufficient support or take sufficient interest in the cultural activities of the majority community in Northern Ireland? Will he ensure that in future the Arts Council membership reflects the strength and supports the cultural interest of the majority community in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Hanley: In the reform of the Arts Council in Northern Ireland I am pleased and regard it as highly desirable that the council's independence as the Government's advisers on our policies has been retained. It is therefore the decision taker on the allocation of resources for the arts. I hope that that will remain the position for good and all. However, I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will make his comments to the chairman. If he has any criticisms, he can take them up with the new Arts Council.

Inward Investment

7. Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will give an estimate of the amount of inward investment to Northern Ireland in the last five years and the number of extra jobs this has created.

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Sir Patrick Mayhew): During the past five years, 52 inward investment projects have been attracted to Northern Ireland, holding out on completion the prospect of 7,500 new jobs. Nearly 3,000 of those jobs have been created so far. Of those 39 projects that have received financial assistance from the Industrial Development Board, the total amount of inward investment to Northern Ireland is £400 million.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: While I welcome that excellent news for the people of Northern Ireland, does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that inward investment would be greatly increased if political talks were to start?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: That must be so, as my hon. Friend says. I am grateful to him for his welcome of the figures that I have given. To the extent that there is dissension and, of course, paramilitary activity, that is a disincentive to inward investment. It is yet another illustration, if one were needed, of how absurd it is for those who take part in violence for political ends to claim that they act on behalf of the ordinary people of Northern Ireland, or any section of them.

Mr. Mallon: The Secretary of State will be aware that groupings in many towns throughout Northern Ireland are attempting to interest people in America and other places in inward investment and job creation in Northern Ireland. He will also be aware from his visits there that it is a difficult and arduous task. What plans does the Department of Economic Development have to assist in practical and financial ways those groupings, which are doing a good job against all the odds?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: The parts of Northern Ireland of which the hon. Gentleman speaks, and the one that he represents, always have access to the Industrial Development Board in particular for assistance in that matter. We recognise the need to spread investment widely throughout the Province. But, of course, one cannot dictate to inward investors in what part of the Province they shall place their investment. That has to be left to them. To them, Northern Ireland is a small place. However, I give an undertaking to the hon. Gentleman that I will encourage the IDB and any other suitable agency to give whatever assistance it can. I notice that Her Majesty's Customs and Excise relocated to the hon. Gentleman's constituency with 100 jobs. But I have to recognise that that was in 1990-91. I know that the hon. Gentleman would like something more recent.

Dame Peggy Fenner: It is unusual for me to ask a question in Northern Ireland time, but, while I understand the great need to attract inward investment to Northern Ireland and the difficulties that Northern Ireland has, does my right hon. and learned Friend believe that it should be done at the expense of British firms? In my constituency, the unemployment level is 12·2 per cent. Northern Ireland has offered to Montupet, a French firm, a product line in Northern Ireland. It is undercutting my constituency's product line on the ground that it has Government support. There must surely be free competition.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: One of the IDB's considerations is the likely or potential impact that inward investment of a particular character might have on businesses already established in the United Kingdom. However, my hon. Friend will recognise that in Northern Ireland the unemployment rate is much greater than that of the rest of the United Kingdom. I do not think that the people of the United Kingdom as a whole would grudge the people of Northern Ireland, with the special problems that they face, the assistance they get through the IDB and other agencies.

Mr. Trimble: Does the Secretary of State appreciate that the figures he mentioned in his original reply are minuscule compared with the need and that they compare unfavourably with the success of neighbouring regions? Will he confirm that it is the objective of the Industrial Development Board to attract investment to Northern Ireland? Will he then repudiate the recent sentiments expressed by the chairman of the IDB that all of Ireland should be treated as a single unit—a not surprising view because of the way in which the Irish Government effectively secured his appointment?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: The hon. Gentleman pursued a number of hares. Anything that the extremely distinguished new chairman of the IDB has said is capable of speaking for itself. I do not regard the figures as minuscule or anything like it; nor would any of those who have benefited through jobs created welcome that description. The total jobs promoted, 7,500, is substantial and we look forward to more. In the past year, a substantial investment —£167 million—has been attracted. All of that is very much to the good right across the board in Northern Ireland.

Sir Giles Shaw: Can my right hon. and learned Friend say how much of the new investment over that five-year period has come from the United States of America?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: Not precisely. I will correct the figure if I am wrong, but something like 30 companies that are established in Northern Ireland are domiciled in the United States. The United States contributes substantially to the International Fund for Ireland and is an important investor in the Province. That was one reason why I was glad to welcomed the southern legislative conference of United States politicians a few months ago and, incidentally, to read what they said when they left—that they were determined to correct the image of Northern Ireland because they did not recognise the place that they visited against what the media showed in the United States.

VAT (Fuel)

8. Mr. Wicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps his Department intends to take to offer those already receiving social security benefit extra payments fully to offset the increases in fuel bills after the levy of VAT at 8 and 17·5 per cent.; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: In his recent Budget speech, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer made it clear that from April 1994 poorer pensioners and other poor families will get extra help. Details of the precise way in which the extra help will be provided will be announced in the autumn. Other social security beneficiaries will be assisted through the normal uprating mechanism.

Mr. Wicks: Given the very high fuel costs in Northern Ireland, and the fact that already cold-related deaths each winter kill more people than even the terrorists, will the hon. Gentleman take action not only to protect social security payments but to provide a home energy efficiency programme so that the old and the cold may have some reassurance about the terrible proposal to put VAT on fuel?

Mr. Hanley: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman, who takes a keen interest in the matter, may welcome the fact that over the last five years there has been a reduction in real terms of between 6 and 7 per cent. in electricity costs in Northern Ireland, while I admit that costs are high. In addition, since February 1988, there has been a reduction in real terms of between 13 and 15 per cent. in the cost of solid fuel, including coal.

The hon. Gentleman referred to deaths which result from severe weather. The Government, as he knows, have introduced changes so that cold weather payments are made automatically without a claim. As to energy efficiency, although my noble Friend Lord Arran is now the Minister responsible for that issue, when I was Minister I was pleased to visit at least three energy efficiency schemes. They are popular and welcome.

Mr. Robert B. Jones: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is just as important to ensure that energy is used efficiently as to ensure that benefits are updated? Therefore, may I congratulate him and his Department on the steps taken to place a duty on the electricity industry in Northern Ireland to seek energy efficiency saving measures? The Environment Select Committee is about to embark on an inquiry into this and I hope that the Northern Ireland experience will be of help to my colleagues and me on that Committee.

Mr. Hanley: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend. I know that my colleagues on the Front Bench will welcome what he says. It is worth pointing out that the introduction of VAT on domestic fuel is designed for environmental protection. It is strange that the Labour party does not welcome that quite as much as it should when one considers that it said in its manifesto that it would consider increased use of the fiscal system to promote environmental protection.

Mr. Molyneaux: Although I welcome the limited assurances about persons in receipt of various income benefits, will the Minister pay particular regard to the plight of the frugal poor who will be extremely hard hit by the application of VAT to domestic fuel?

Mr. Hanley: The right hon. Gentleman speaks for many hon. Members when he expresses concern for that category of person, above income support levels, whom we should consider sympathetically. We will always try to increase benefit levels in line with need. I am sure that he would not want me to announce in advance any changes that might be considered to the upratings in November or April.

Electricity Generating Capacity

9. Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what representations he has received from private companies in Northern Ireland regarding new electricity generating capacity.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I have received a number of representations, but the responsibility for new generating capacity rests with Northern Ireland Electricity plc.

Mr. Foulkes: Could the Secretary of State clear up a mystery for me? Why is it that he and his junior Minister seem to favour an interconnector—which will scar my constituency—that will bring electricity from Scotland to Northern Ireland more expensively than cheaper electricity generated in Northern Ireland by lignite, coal or gas? What is the hidden agenda of the Northern Ireland Office on this matter?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: The thinking of the Northern Ireland Office is that it will be a good thing if we can get some competition in the supply of electricity and the supply of fuel for electricity. The hon. Gentleman is aware that we are 70 per cent. dependent on oil. That is why we want an interconnector to bring electricity from Scotland and that is why we shall have a gas interconnector, as requested by the hon. Gentleman. Northern Ireland Electricity will certainly take into account the claims of lignite when it starts the competition for the supply of further generating capacity, which it will need towards the end of this century.

Mr. Bill Walker: Will my right hon. and learned Friend, when considering this matter, bear in mind the advantages to Scotland should an interconnector be put in place? Will he also bear in mind that many of us would like him and many of his colleagues in the Cabinet to look at European funds, which we see as our money, and get them back for the United Kingdom, if we can? The cost of an interconnector would be an admirable reason for receiving money from the cohesion fund or other funds.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I am glad to confirm to my hon. Friend that the European Community will contribute 35 per cent. of the cost of the electricity interconnector, if it receives the necessary planning permission. That fits in extremely well with the EC policy for trans-European networks. On that ground and on others, I believe that there are advantages for Northern Ireland and I am very glad to hear that there are also advantages for Scotland.

Mr. William Ross: Does the Secretary of State understand that although we regret the steady increase in electricity costs—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. The House must come to order. The hon. Gentleman has the right to be heard in the House.

Mr. Ross: Perhaps the microphone is not working. We welcome the fact that, although the electricity costs are increasing, the Secretary of State has been able to phase them in over a much longer period than was previously thought. Because Northern Ireland depends upon electricity to such an extent, and given our need to use the cheapest possible sources of electricity, will he ensure that whenever the possible use of lignite is considered it will be allowed to compete on a level playing field?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: The answer is yes. The hon. Gentleman is right in that there is considerable advantage in the phasing arrangements that I have announced. They will apply not only to large industrial users but to all 4,000 industrial users right across the board, not for two but for four years. So, as he acknowledges, that is a considerable alleviation. Also, nobody will have to pay more this year than a single figure increase.

Ports (Traffic)

10. Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland which of the principal ports of Northern Ireland has carried the greatest tonnage of outward traffic in each year since 1987.

Mr. Atkins: In 1987, the port of Larne carried the greatest tonnage of outward traffic, but in each year since then Belfast has carried the higher total.

Mr. Fabricant: Will my hon. Friend join me in congratulating the port of Larne on its investment of £7 million in a new quay? Is he aware that, contrary to earlier suggestions, a substantial amount of that money comes from the European Commission, from the European regional development fund?

Mr. Atkins: Yes, Madam Speaker.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 22 April.

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): This morning, I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Will my right hon. Friend welcome today's unemployment figures, down for the second month running and coming on top of an increase of 1½ per cent. in manufacturing output and 2 per cent. in the retail sales figures—proof that the economy is growing in confidence? Does he agree that it is about time Opposition Members stopped prophesying gloom and doom about the economy?

The Prime Minister: This is only the second successive month, but today's fall in unemployment will be seen as very good news by everyone, especially the families of people now back in work. Especially welcome is the fact that the number of unemployed people has fallen in Scotland, Wales, Northern Ireland and in each and every region in England. My hon. Friend is right to say that there are signs of growing business and consumer confidence. I hope that in the future that will bring further good news on jobs, which everyone who wishes this country well will surely welcome.

Mr. John Smith: While welcoming the fall—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."]—in the official unemployment total announced today, is it not the case that a total of over 2,900,000 is still far too high and should never have been allowed to reach anything like that level? If the Prime Minister seeks to take credit for a fall of 26,000 in the official figures, is he equally prepared to accept responsibility for the million people who have lost their jobs since he became Prime Minister, the vast majority of whom are still unemployed?

The Prime Minister: Grudging might be an appropriate word for that welcome, but I at least welcome the fact that the right hon. and learned Gentleman has this month, unlike last month, welcomed the fall in unemployment. Perhaps he might mention to the shadow Chancellor—who said even yesterday that unemployment would go on rising—that he should look more carefully in future.

If the right hon. and learned Gentleman shares with me a wish to produce permanent, long-term jobs in a growing economy, perhaps he will also join me in the right policies to achieve that, including welcoming limits on public sector pay, welcoming caps on council spending, welcoming our trade union reforms, dropping his equivocation over strikes and welcoming our reforms to improve education. If he really cares about future long-term employment, will he welcome those? Yes or no?

Mr. John Smith: Does the Prime Minister appreciate —[HON. MEMBERS: "Answer."]—that unemployment at this continuing high level is in large part a reflection of the underlying weakness of an economy bedevilled by persistent under-investment in manufacturing and skills and menaced by a dangerously high balance of payments deficit? if the Government's economic policies are satisfactory, why are we suffering a multi-billion pound deficit in our balance of payments at a time of recession? What does the Prime Minister propose to do about that?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. and learned Gentleman really should lift his eyes. I know that he has to encourage his Back Benchers, but he should know that across Europe, 17 million people are unemployed and it is becoming increasingly apparent to everyone except the right hon. and learned Gentleman that that is the result of the international economy over many years. There are also 3 million unemployed in France. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman wants the answer to the question he should look at what is now happening in the economy. Car production figures last month were the highest for 19 years, a survey by the British chambers of commerce shows that business confidence is up, there has been the biggest growth in manufacturing exports for three years, surveys by the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors all show good news. In addition, there are extra jobs at Toyota in Derbyshire, Ford in Dunton and Kimberly-Clark in Humberside. Why does not the right hon. and learned Gentleman welcome what everyone else but him can see?

Mr. John Smith: Why does the Prime Minister not answer the question that I asked him? Why was it predicted in the Budget that the balance of payments would deteriorate from £12 billion to £17·5 billion? Is there any other country in the European Community with such a miserable prospect?

The Prime Minister: The European Community as a whole has a deficit, which the right hon. and learned Gentleman clearly does not know. The right hon. and learned Gentleman is yet again changing horses. Every month he used to ask me about inflation, until it fell when he stopped talking about it. He then started talking about unemployment until it began to level off and fall. Now he has changed horses again. I have bad news for the right hon. and learned Gentleman: he is going to run out of things to whinge about.

Q2. Mr. Pickles: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 22 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Pickles: In replying to the Leader of the Opposition, my right hon. Friend referred to the report of the British chambers of commerce. Did he see in that report that business confidence and business activity are both at high levels? Did he also note that the amount of export orders is at an all-time high? Given that trade union leaders, commentators and even economists now see an improvement—[Interruption.] I am sorry that the Opposition do not like improvements. Does my right hon. Friend, like me, look forward to the time when all hon. Members will welcome good economic news and talk Britain up rather than whinge?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend, of course, is right. Any good news for the economy is bad news for the Labour party. There has been a range of encouraging economic news, but we wish to see far more—to that extent, I agree with the right hon. and learned Gentleman, the Leader of the Opposition. There has been a range of encouraging economic information—retail sales are up, exports are up, manufacturing output is up, car production is up, house sales are up and business confidence is up. That is leading to a position whereby Britain will be on the up.

Mrs. Roche: Given the appalling record of Group 4 prison escort services, will the Prime Minister urge his right hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler), who is the chairman of the Tory party, to resign from another Group 4 company?

The Prime Minister: No.

Q3. Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 22 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mrs. Gillan: Will my right hon. Friend join me in welcoming the overwhelming vote in Italy against proportional representation—[Interruption.] Does it not reinforce my right hon. Friend's view that the first-past-the-post system is the best one, and delivers decisive, democratic and honest government? Will he join me, 32 million Italians and the deputy Leader of the Opposition in recommending the first-past-the-post system to the Leader of the Opposition and the Front-Bench team?

The Prime Minister: This is, of course, a divisive issue, which divides, not least, the Labour party as to whether it is in favour of proportional representation. I have never made any secret of my views on proportional representation. It is one of the few matters on which I share the views of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway. While others have tried to dance on the head of a pin during the election, the Conservative party campaigned four-square for the existing system. It has brought us over many decades stable and secure government. I hope that it will do the same for the Italians. The Italians are right to scrap the backstairs deals that inevitably come with PR.

Mr. Salmond: Talking of back stairs, does the Prime Minister believe—

[Hon. Members: Back stairs

Madam Speaker: Order. All these interruptions are very time-consuming.

Mr. Salmond: Does the Prime Minister believe that the provisions of the social chapter are popular or unpopular with the general public? Does he intend to include in his European speech this evening a passage expressing thanks to the leader of the Labour party for saving his political bacon in the referendum vote in the early hours of this morning?

The Prime Minister: I know that the hon. Gentleman will, as he always does, read my speech with great care——

Mr. Hood: Send him a letter.

The Prime Minister: I will not promise to send the hon. Gentleman a letter on this matter but, at the risk of leaking my own speech, he may not find the sentence that he seeks in it this evening.

Q4. Mr. Ward: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 22 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Ward: Will my right hon. Friend speed up the efforts being made to prevent British industry and commerce being stifled by over-regulation? Is he aware that there is still much evidence that officials are being over-zealous in the interpretations of health, safety and fire regulations, with the resulting damage to British commerce and industry?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is entirely right that unnecessary regulation and bureaucracy—I emphasise the word unnecessary—stifle industry and enterprise. I also agree with him that we have to beware of over-implementation of regulations whether from Whitehall, Brussels, county hall or town hall. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment and my other right hon. Friends are all examining regulations to see what might satisfactorily be diluted or scrapped. This will be a continuing programme and I hope that we shall be able to bring measures before the House before too long.

Mr. Hood: Will the Prime Minister take the opportunity to restate his confidence in the Chancellor of the Exchequer? Would he like to describe his position as unsellable?

The Prime Minister: I know that I am keen on exports, but there is a limit.

Thurlestone Hotel, South Devon

Q5. Mr. Steen: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make an official visit to the Thurlestone hotel in South Devon.

The Prime Minister: Although I have no current plans to do so, I will certainly bear the possibility in mind for my next visit to the west country. I understand, however, that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for National Heritage met the proprietor, Mr. David Grose, when he visited the area last Friday. I gather that the hotel has been in the same family since the 1890s and even in difficult times has been expanding its business.

Mr. Steen: When my right hon. Friend does come to the hotel, I think that he will be fascinated to take a look at the decor, because every room in the hotel is covered in a plethora of red tape. I suggest that the Prime Minister should get hold of the new officials who are zealously interpreting the rules and regulations and make sure that they do not destroy hotels and small businesses. In particular, he should have regard for the undercover operations of the hygiene police.

Will my right hon. Friend, in his deregulation initiative, make sure that he gets rid of a number of public officials and puts a moratorium on the implementation of rules and regulations—and lifts the burden of such rules and regulations off the backs of the hoteliers?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is well known as a champion both of the south-west and of deregulation. I know how important both are to him and I will take careful note of what he has to say. We certainly wish to cut as much red tape as possible.

Mr. Hume: When the Prime Minister visits this hotel in Devon, will he give consideration to the fact that this generation of human beings is living through the greatest economic revolution in the history of the world—a technological, telecommunications and transport revolution? Will he bear in mind that it means that the wealth of society is being created by far fewer people and that that in turn has great implications for the role of the state in the social and economic welfare of people? The Government should therefore be paying far greater attention to the role of the state in that capacity, instead of heading in the direction in which they are going: privatisation, survival of the fittest and, ultimately, the law of the jungle.

The Prime Minister: I think that the hon. Gentleman is quite right about the fact that this is likely to be one of the most rapidly changing decades in peacetime in the lifetime of even the most venerable Members in the House.

Technological change is inevitable and should be welcomed. It brings with it great benefits. I know that many people always fear that any technological change will have an adverse effect on jobs. I am sure that that argument was advanced when the wheel and a whole series of other inventions were thought up. We must live with technological change; we must advance it; we must make the most of it; and we must lead it.

Business of the House

3.31 pm

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): Will the Leader of the House state the business for next week?

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Tony Newton): Yes, Madam. The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 26 APRIL—Second Reading of the Finance (No. 2) Bill.

TUESDAY 27 APRIL—Until about seven o'clock, Second Reading of the Non-Domestic Rating (No. 2) Bill.

Remaining stages of the Disability (Grants) Bill.

WEDNESDAY 28 APRIL—Remaining stages of the National Lottery etc. Bill.

THURSDAY 29 APRIL—Debate on Bosnia, on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

FRIDAY 30 APRIL—Private Members' Bills.

As the following Monday is a bank holiday, I thought it would be helpful for the House to have, on the usual provisional basis, an indication of the business that we have in mind for Tuesday 4 May. Subject to progress in Committee, there will be progress on remaining stages of the European Communities (Amendment) Bill.

It may also be for the convenience of the House to know that the House will be invited to approve the motions on the Order Paper relating to the House of Commons Members Fund tomorrow, Friday 23 April.

The House will also wish to know that European Standing Committee B will meet on Wednesday 28 April at 10.30 am to consider a European Community document on distance selling.

[Wednesday 28 April:
European Standing Committee B
Relevant European Community Document
7151/92 Distance selling
Relevant Report of the European Legislation Committee HC 79-vi (1992-93).]

Mrs. Beckett: I thank the Leader of the House for that statement. The Opposition strongly welcome his announcement of a debate on Bosnia on Thursday. We all very much appreciate the speedy response from the Government to our pressure on them to find time for such a crucial debate.

Is the right hon. Gentleman aware of the evidence given yesterday to the Public Accounts Committee showing that, following disclosure of millions of pounds worth of mismanagement and fraud in the West Midlands regional health authority, the chair of that authority relinquished his post, whereupon a golden handshake of some thousands of pounds was personally authorised by the Secretary of State for Health? Will he arrange for the right hon. Lady to come to the House and make a statement about why she authorised that payment?

Could the right hon. Gentleman also arrange for a statement about the future of Prime Minister's Question Time? He will recall that last week, in answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Delyn (Mr. Hanson), he was good enough to say that he considered Prime Minister's Question Time an effective means of scrutiny. Has he seen the statement in today's Financial Times, suggesting that the Prime Minister does not think so and proposes to arrange televised press conferences at which he will be enabled to present his point of view unhindered by the House of Commons? What progress has been made in those discussions, and will the Leader of the House arrange for discussions with the broadcasting authorities so that we may have a balance, with other parties having a similar facility?

Will the right hon. Gentleman consider making time to deal with two ten-minute Bills passed yesterday, one at its Committee stage and the other on Second Reading? Both Bills help to address some aspects of rising crime that are worrying the British public. The Bill of my hon. Friend the Member for Warwickshire, North (Mr. O'Brien) gives the Government the opportunity to end, without having to wait for major legislation, the anomaly in the Criminal Justice Act 1991 that stops magistrates and judges giving proper consideration to previous convictions. The other Bill, which completed its Committee stage in one sitting, is that of the hon. Member for Shoreham (Mr. Stephen) and deals with repetitive car offences such as death riding. I understand that it has been greatly improved by amendments introduced in Committee by my party. We would welcome the Government considering finding time for those measures; and, of course, we would like an Opposition day.

Mr. Newton: I note the right hon. Lady's last request, which I thought might come. I think that I have been meeting the right hon. Lady's frequent requests at the rate of about one a week, so I am not doing too badly. I shall continue to bear her last request in mind.

The right hon. Lady asked about the Public Accounts Committee and the West Midlands regional health authority. I think that the House will agree that it would not be appropriate at this stage for me to comment on what the right hon. Lady said. I shall certainly draw it to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health, who is to answer questions on Tuesday 4 May.

The right hon. Lady asked about ten-minute Bills. She will know that it has not been our practice to make Government time available for private Members' Bills. She will also know that it is not impossible for such Bills to make progress, provided that there is sufficient co-operation in the House. I take her remarks as an indication that such co-operation would be forthcoming.

The right hon. Lady spoke about Prime Minister's Question Time and referred to press conferences. I think that she will agree that the main thrust of her question was primarily for the broadcasting authorities and not for me. I imagine that the answer would depend in part on whether it was felt that what others had to say was of as much interest as what my right hon. Friend had to say. Any thoughts that my right hon. Friend might have about communicating more widely certainly do not call into question the effectiveness of the process that we witnessed over the past 20 minutes.

I am glad to have been able to make time for a debate on Bosnia, and I know that many of my hon. Friends will also be pleased about that. It was kind of the right hon. Lady to be so generous in her observations. Some of the discussions—I hope that I am allowed to say this—through the usual channels that led to that took place when we found ourselves in the same Lobby late last night.

I hope that the right hon. Lady will take that as an encouragement to be in the Government Lobby more frequently.

Mrs. Angela Knight (Erewash): Would my right hon. Friend consider a debate in the next few days on financial mismanagement by some local councils? Many of my constituents are concerned about the way in which the police are hampered in their excellent job by the failure of Derbyshire county council to give them the funds they need. Is that poor financial priority not one of the reasons why constituents such as mine who live in a Labour area will, on average, pay £100 more in council tax than they would pay if they lived in a Conservative-controlled area?

Mr. Newton: I note my hon. Friend's request, and I fully understand the reasons for the concern that has led her to raise the matter in this way. Therefore, I am all the more sorry that I cannot immediately promise such a debate.

Sir David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): In view of the deadline of 15 May for the return of the IACS forms, will the Leader of the House arrange for an urgent debate on early day motion 1763?

[That this House, noting the commitment of the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to reduce bureaucracy and the comparative simplicity of the administration in other EC member states, calls upon the Prime Minister to set up an immediate reappraisal of the Integrated Administration and Control System for the arable area, beef special and suckler cow schemes as part of his deregulation initiative.]

It deals with the maladministration of the scheme. Is the Minister aware that the scheme is much more complicated than those in any other European Community country, that it is expensive for farmers, in some cases, to hire surveyors to measure their fields, and that Ordnance Survey is unable to supply the required maps for some of them? Therefore, it is urgent that the matter be debated in the House.

Mr. Newton: I cannot undertake to provide time for such a debate, but I know that my right hon. and hon. Friends in the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food have been assiduously attending meetings around the country to explain their proposals and the position on the forms. They have found that the reception, when farmers have found that the forms are not as difficult to fill in as they thought, has been good.

Mr. Barry Porter (Wirral, South): I am delighted to note that we shall have a debate about Bosnia, although I doubt very much that the United Kingdom will have much effect on the fate of that country. Could we have a debate about a part of the United Kingdom where British troops are committed, where we have a responsibility and where we can have some effect? I am talking about Northern Ireland. That is without reference necessarily to Dublin or Washington.

Mr. Newton: As my hon. Friend knows, we have a number of opportunities to debate Northern Ireland matters. That includes one last week, quite apart from Northern Ireland questions within the last hour and a quarter or so. I cannot immediately undertake to provide time for another debate, but I am sure that it will not be too long before there will be an opportunity for one.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): The Leader of the House will be aware of the significant rise in poverty-related diseases such as scabies, tuberculosis and dysentery. Many Labour Members are concerned about public health, and know that there are many reasons for that rise, not least privatisation of the water industry and cuts in benefits. Will he make time for an early debate on that urgent matter, and will he bear in mind the fact that such diseases do not respect class and, quite often, those at the top of the hill get the diseases as well?

Mr. Newton: Leaving aside some of the over-political messages in the first part of the hon. Lady's question, which I do not accept, she will know that there have been a number of opportunities in the House—probably more than under any Government for some time—to discuss general matters in the improvement of public health. In recent times, that has been not least because the Government have a more developed strategy for the improvement of the nation's health than any in the country's history.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): Every right hon. and hon. Member should welcome the improvement in the economic information that is coming through day by day. In order to build on that, and to reduce the heavy costs to the country and the taxpayer of unemployment, will my right hon. Friend find, at an early date, time for a debate on industry and trade, which is so important to the improvement of the economy, so that hon. Members on both sides of the House can share with the appropriate Secretary of State their views on such matters as the importance of import substitution and investment allowances, which can be so beneficial in further improving the recently improved economic indicators?

Mr. Newton: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's remarks about the improved economic indicators. I hope that he will not take it amiss if I acknowledge his question as a trailer for the Adjournment debate that I understand that he has tonight on import substitution. I am sure that, having heard him this afternoon, everyone present will now be here to hear him tonight.

Ms. Ann Coffey (Stockport): Will the Leader of the House arrange for an early debate on the aerospace industry, in view of Lord Weinstock's evidence to the Select Committee on Trade and Industry, which showed that the decline of Government investment in the industry is prejudicing our future ability to compete with countries such as Japan and the United States, whose Governments are putting in a far higher level of investment and research —for example, in new materials?

Mr. Newton: I understand why the question has been raised in that way. I recall that a somewhat similar question was asked of me last week, when I made a point that I shall repeat now. There can be no doubt of the Government's commitment to the aerospace industry, not least as evidenced by the efforts of my right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the President of the Board of Trade and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Defence in obtaining further orders for it.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): How is my right hon. Friend getting on with the excellent all-party Jopling report? Is he aware that there is increasing exasperation in all parts of the House about getting these reforms implemented?

Mr. Newton: I am certainly aware of the concern that progress should be made. As I have said on a number of occasions, I too am anxious to see progress. I know that the right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) is also keen to see progress, whenever that is possible.

Mr. Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South): I am sure that the Leader of the House will be aware of the terribly sad loss of life of citizens from Nottingham, Manchester and elsewhere in the Waco inferno. Will he find time in the Government's programme to make a statement about the consular support to be given to those who survived the siege, and in that statement will he find space for an explanation of the contradictory reports about the events leading up to the inferno?

Mr. Newton: Obviously enough, the United States Administration are conducting their inquiries and we shall follow them closely. As for the hon. Gentleman's point about consular support, the right course would be for me to bring that matter to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): May I, not surprisingly, thank my right hon. Friend for providing time for a debate on Bosnia? Will that debate be on a motion for the Adjournment, and will both the Foreign Secretary and the Secretary of State for Defence take part in it?

Mr. Newton: I said in my statement that the debate would take place on a motion for the Adjournment. It will be within my hon. Friend's knowledge that my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Defence is out of the country, so I had better not make a commitment on his behalf in his absence, but my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary will certainly take part in the debate.

Mr. Thomas Graham (Renfrew, West and Inverclyde): Will the Leader of the House arrange to bring the Secretary of State for Scotland here to make a statement regarding what happened to a seven-and-a-half-year-old girl in my constituency? She had a serious accident. When she went to her local hospital, they did not treat her properly. She was given no tetanus jab—no nothing—and was sent home. All she was asked was whether she wanted a private dentist. She went to another hospital, where she was kept in, operated on and fully looked after. The Secretary of State for Scotland ought to come here and make a statement to the House about why my young constituent was not properly dealt with. It was a disgrace.

Mr. Newton: Were my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland here, I am sure that he would certainly undertake to look into the point that the hon. Gentleman has raised. I shall bring it to his attention so that he can have the opportunity to do so.

Mr. David Sumberg (Bury, South): May we have a statement next week from the Foreign Secretary outlining the Government's efforts to support the worldwide attempt to obtain the release of the Israeli airman, Ron Arad? I ask that question because his family is coming to this place next week to meet a number of hon. Members, including myself and my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall), when it would be good to be able to reassure the family that his plight is not forgotten.

Mr. Newton: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising that point. He knows that the Government collectively, and, I am sure, the whole House, have great sympathy for the families of those who are still held. We shall continue to call for the release of all those who are still held outside the due process of law. My hon. Friend will be aware that the United Nations also has an important role to play.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Will the Leader of the House arrange for the Prime Minister to make a statement following his meeting with Salman Rushdie, which could be next week, and assure the House that the means of safeguarding his life are to be sustained and continued, that anybody who advocates his death or harm should be prosecuted, and that the Government are determined to work for the day when Salman Rushdie can walk and argue his case freely among the rest of the community?

Mr. Newton: The very fact that my right hon. Friend is due to meet Mr. Rushdie is an indication of the British Government's concern that his rights should be properly protected.

Ms Angela Browning (Tiverton): Will my right hon. Friend consider holding an urgent debate in the House on school transport? As he will be aware, the regulations are enshrined in the Education Act 1944. The rules and regulations that local authorities have to implement are anachronistic in the 1990s. Anomalies such as the different provision that is made for eight-year-olds and nine-year-olds in the same family are particularly poignant in rural areas, where conditions today are quite different from those in 1944. This issue is causing great concern in my rural constituency of Tiverton.

Mr. Newton: I cannot promise my hon. Friend an early debate but, as ever, I can promise that the matter will be drawn to the attention of one of my right hon. Friends —in this case, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): Will the Leader of the House arrange for a statement to be made next week by the Home Secretary in connection with the deliberations of the Boundaries Commission on the allocation of the six additional United Kingdom seats in the European Parliament? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that strong rumours are circulating in the House that all six seats will be allocated to England, with none for Scotland, Wales or Northern Ireland? That is a matter for great concern to those of us in the parties that represent those nations of the United Kingdom, and we also recognise that it has important implications for the European Communities (Amendment) Bill.

Mr. Newton: The hon. Lady will be aware that the position remains as I have stated it once or twice in recent weeks. The Government are still considering the matter, and once proposals have been formulated, we plan to consult the Opposition parties.

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton): In passing, I thank my right hon. Friend for his announcement that the National Lottery etc. Bill will be further considered on Wednesday. Many good causes outside the House will applaud the Government for that.

However, looking to the future, may I ask my right hon. Friend to consider a full debate on London soon, preferably in the middle of the week? Conservative Members strongly support causes that try to promote London through the London Forum, and to cut out corruption, which unfortunately is happening in too many London boroughs, but Opposition Members are apparently petitioning to bring back the dreary days of the Greater London council.

Mr. Newton: The first part of my hon. Friend's question was a classic example of what I would call the Oliver Twist mentality in this place. No sooner does one fulfil one demand than another comes along. At any rate, I am glad to have pleased not one but two of my hon. Friends with my announcements this afternoon.

I continue to take note of my hon. Friend's second concern, but just before the Easter Adjournment, the House had an opportunity to debate London matters for some three hours during the debates that substituted for the old Consolidated Fund Bill debates.

Mr. Bill Olner (Nuneaton): I support my hon. Friend the Member for Stockport (Ms Coffey) in asking the Leader of the House to provide time for a debate on the British aerospace industry. Although I welcome the small reduction in the number of the unemployed, it is ironic that, on the day on which those figures were announced, 500 people at Rolls-Royce factories in the Coventry area received compulsory redundancy notices in their pay packets. The British aerospace industry, a great leader and export earner for the country, is slowly haemorrhaging away, and needs Government support for research and development and other activities to tide it over a difficult period. I wish that the Leader of the House would find time for a debate on that most important matter.

Mr. Newton: I am afraid that I cannot add to what I said to the hon. Member for Stockport this week and to somebody else last week or the week before, but I hope that the hon. Member for Nuneaton (Mr. Olner), too, will draw some encouragement from the improved economic indicators. Part of the underlying problem has been the drop in demand from airlines and others that has arisen from the worldwide recession, so improvements in the economy anywhere will help in due course.

Mr. John Butcher (Coventry, South-West): May I persuade my right hon. Friend to arrange a debate on the effects of the worldwide and domestic shortage of risk capital for investment, especially in small and medium-sized manufacturing companies in this country? Does he share my sense of urgency, because that shortage of capital for small unquoted companies may impede our industrial recovery? If, for example, we were to signal the abolition of capital gains tax during such a debate we might, in line with the Prime Minister's policy, make this country a haven for inward investment and give ourselves a considerable competitive edge.

Mr. Newton: That is the kind of question I really like. It leads me straight to the first piece of parliamentary business for next week, the Finance (No. 2) Bill. I forecast, Madam Speaker, that my hon. Friend will be seeking to catch your eye.

Mr. John McAllion (Dundee, East): Earlier today, the House was informed that the Northern Ireland Office was abandoning its plans to privatise water in this Parliament, not for policy reasons but for technical ones—in particular, for reasons relating to EC directives. As these same directives must apply equally to Scotland, may we have an early statement from the Secretary of State for Scotland to confirm that he too is abandoning any plans he may have to privatise Scottish water? I warn the Government that, if they leave Scotland alone to face the prospect of water privatisation in this Parliament, they will be met with resistance, inside and outside the House, which will make the troubles of this year look like the tamest of tame tea parties.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): There will be blood and snot.

Mr. Newton: I do not know whether to regard those as helpful observations, but they were clearly welcomed by the hon. Member for Bolsover. The principal reason for my right hon. and learned Friend's announcement is related to the new customer billing system scheduled for introduction in April 1996. The Government's commitment to water privatisation in Northern Ireland as soon as practicable was reaffirmed. I do not see that it has any implications for the current consideration of these matters in relation to Scotland.

Mr. Andrew Hunter (Basingstoke): Bearing in mind the considerable public concern that has been expressed about the Government's intention to treat timeshare dwellings as commercial property, and therefore subject to the uniform business rate, will my right hon. Friend give serious consideration to making arrangements for statutory instruments Nos. 526 and 542—against which I have prayed—to be referred to a Standing Committee for debate?

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend will be aware that such properties are already subject to the uniform business rate, and were during the latter period of the community charge. I know of the concern that has been expressed in some quarters about this, and my hon. Friend's prayer. I cannot give an immediate undertaking of the kind that my hon. Friend seeks, but I will certainly look into the point that he has raised.

Mr. Skinner Now let's see if the Leader of the House can handle this one. Before the right hon. Gentleman got this job, he used to be well versed in social security—right? Is he aware that a few days ago, when we had the mining debate—in a blaze of publicity—we had a statement on emphysema and bronchitis, and thousands of people in every part of Britain believed that they were going to get payment? Now it seems to have gone dead.

I want to know from the Leader of the House whether, with his knowledge of social security, he can give a guarantee that a statement is going to be made very shortly as to how the payments are going to be made, who is going to qualify and will the widows of miners also qualify. Will he get the answers to those questions for the House? In every constituency, people want to know the answer.

Mr. Newton: The answer to the original question—which, in effect, was, do I recall being the Secretary of State for Social Security?—is yes. The answer to the other part is that I am aware of the pleasure that was caused by my right hon. Friend's announcement in response to the report from the Industrial Injuries Advisory Council. I am also aware that, because of the very nature of the scheme, industrial injury claims can be difficult and complex to assess. I shall not attempt to give an off-the-cuff-answer, because I do have that experience as a Secretary of State. My right hon. Friend the current Secretary of State for Social Security and his Ministers will be here on Monday next to answer questions, and I will draw their attention to what the hon. Gentleman has said.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): The Leader of the House has kindly advised us that the Report stage of the European Communities (Amendment) Bill will start a week on Tuesday. Is it the Government's intention for Third Reading not to be debated until after the Danish referendum?

Mr. Newton: I have no reason to depart from the statements that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and others have made about that matter on a number of occasions.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Will the Leader of the House give an assurance that there will be adequate time on Report to discuss the many aspects of the European Communities (Amendment) Bill? Is the Leader of the House aware that, although the issue of a referendum was decided one way on a whipped vote earlier today, that issue will not go away? The British people are entitled to say whether such a constitutional matter of such crucial importance should take place. Therefore, that whipped vote in the early hours of the morning does not amount to much, no matter how much the two Front Benches combined.

Mr. Newton: Whatever the nature of the vote, from what I observed last night, there was not a great deal of evidence that the Whip had much effect on those who held views opposite to those of the Front Benches. Therefore, I regard the vote as a genuine expression of the real opinions of the House. There was an overwhelming majority against a referendum.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): When the other place exercises its constitutional duty in respect of what happened last night, it will take account of the fact that, although there was a three-line Whip, 100 Labour and Conservative Members defied that Whip and a further 100 were absent after the 10 o'clock vote. In other words, despite the fact that the Front Benches colluded, 200 hon. Members opposed the measure, while fewer than 200 Back Benchers supported it. As the referendum issue is to be introduced in another place, will my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House tell the other place now, or make a statement next week, whether he will sustain that referendum or seek to throw it out?

Mr. Newton: It would be quite wrong for me to tell another place what conclusions to draw—indeed, it would probably be some kind of breach of privilege. The conclusion that I draw is that, whatever statistical contortions my hon. Friend engages in, the fact is that well over half the House voted against a referendum last night.

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): Will the Leader of the House have a word with the Minister of State, Home Office, the hon. Member for Fareham (Mr. Lloyd), to ensure that, when my Representation of the People (Amendment) Bill returns to the House, it is not objected to and stopped simply by one person, as happened during its earlier passage through the House? It was stopped only on a closure motion, and no one voted against it. In those circumstances, should there not be some progress on a measure that would improve electoral representation and access to polling stations for disabled people?

Mr. Newton: I will certainly bring the hon. Gentleman's point to the attention of my hon. Friend the Minister of State. However, the hon. Gentleman will understand that whether or not someone says, "Object" is determined not in one mind, but possibly in any of 651 minds.

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): Is my right hon. Friend aware that many of us who voted to support the Government in respect of the referendum clause last night did so with as much enthusiasm as that expressed by my hon. Friends who take the alternative point of view?

On my substantive question, is my right hon. Friend aware that, due to the complexity and inadequate thought given to the clauses in the Railways Bill, the Bill has been subjected to substantial amendment and is due to leave Committee without any reference to pensions—which, as my right hon. Friend knows, is a very contentious issue? May I therefore flag up at an early date the fact that we need at least three full days for the Report stage, with probably one full day devoted to the pensions issue alone?

Mr. Newton: My gratitude for the first half of my hon. Friend's question waned rather rapidly as he went on. I will do no more than take note of his request.

Mr. David Trimble (Upper Bann): Can we have an early statement on the Government's proposals, revealed in the press on Monday, to introduce a scheme for the registration of building contractors and building workers? I trust that they are not the new clauses to deal with terrorist funding and racketeering which the Home Secretary said would be added to the Criminal Justice Bill in Committee. While we support the general principle, the detail is quite complex and will require considerable consideration. Unlike the other bodies to which the Northern Ireland Office sent the document for consultation some six or seven weeks ago, the Department has not bothered to consult the political parties concerned.

Mr. Newton: I will bring that complaint—as I take it to be—to the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State. However, I am slightly surprised that it was not raised with him during Northern Ireland questions not so many minutes ago.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Can my right hon. Friend arrange an early debate on adoption policy, so that the House can consider the decision of a committee of the Hampshire county council to allow a lesbian couple to adopt? The question of adoption is absolutely crucial and must always be in the interests of the child. The House should consider whether that decision is in the interests of any child.

Mr. Newton: Since I cannot undertake to find time for a debate on that matter, perhaps the right course is to bring to the attention of my hon. Friend the fact that general policy responsibility in this area rests with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health, who will be here answering questions on Tuesday 4 May.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): In his capacity as Leader of the House, does the right hon. Gentleman approve of the letter sent from the Government Whips Office by the hon. Member for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Arbuthnot) to Tory Back-Benchers inviting them to speak on the totally innocuous and unopposed Bill which is due for consideration before my Freedom and Responsibility of the Press Bill tomorrow, leading Tory Members to believe that the Government's intention is to talk the Bill out? Does he approve of that?

Mr. Newton: I am not immediately familiar with the contents of the letter to which the hon. Member is referring. I shall certainly bring what he says—again, I think it is a complaint—to the attention of those at whom it appears to be directed.

Mr. Rupert Allason (Torbay): My right hon. Friend will be aware that the country is in the grip of a car theft epidemic. Would he be kind enough to ask the Home Secretary to come to the House next week to clarify the law on so-called man traps? There are few deterrents available to the police to prevent car theft. One of them is the self-immobilising vehicle which traps a car thief in the vehicle until the police arrive to cart him off to jail. It is a vital weapon in the fight against crime, but there is some doubt about its legality. It is important that the Home Secretary clarifies the matter as soon as possible. Can my right hon. Friend give an undertaking that the Home Secretary will come to the House to reassure the police?

Mr. Skinner: It is a job for a double agent.

Mr. Allason: The hon. Gentleman should know.

Mr. Newton: Is the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) offering? I will bring the request of my hon. Friend the Member for Torbay (Mr. Allason) to the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Can we have a full day's debate split into two parts—one on Members' interests and the other on procedure? Was the Leader of the House being serious when, in reply to the hon. Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) the other day, he suggested that the Select Committee on Procedure should reconsider the whole question of tabling questions effectively to reopen the door to syndicates? Will he condemn the syndicating of questions and thereby close the door once again on matters of principle?

Mr. Newton: I note the first part of the hon. Gentleman's request. He well knows that I am continuing to look for progress in respect of Members' interests. I think that the prospects may be improving at present.

I do not understand the latter part of the hon. Gentleman's question. My recollection of the exchange with my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay is that it related to the amount of time allowed before the cut-off —it used to be four o'clock, and is now five o'clock— which my hon. Friend appeared to be seeking to have further extended. That is my recollection. I certainly did not have in mind any question of returning to rules which would make syndication easier.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): The House will be reassured by the Prime Minister's commitment to the abolition of unnecessary regulations, especially as they affect many of the 3 million small businesses in the United Kingdom. Will my right hon. Friend find time soon for the House to have a debate on deregulation, especially as it affects matters such as the new regulations on abattoirs, which are causing many small abattoir owners to face bills of £20,000 and £30,000, and the beer regulations which will impose massive costs on pubs throughout the country——

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must complete his question.

Mr. Evans: Yes, Madam Speaker. The beer regulations will also impose massive costs on hotels and small restaurants.

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend will be aware—indeed, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister referred to it not so many minutes ago—of the substantial drive which is going on throughout Government in respect of deregulation. I have no doubt that opportunities for debate will arise in due course. While I cannot promise them next week, I can draw the attention of my hon. Friend to the fact that the Minister of Agriculture will be here answering questions on Thursday 29 April. He has the responsibility for abattoirs.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): Will the Leader of the House nudge the Foreign Secretary and the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the right hon. Member for Watford (Mr. Garel-Jones), to take note of early-day motion 1818 signed by me and 10 other Members of Parliament?

[That this House is appalled by the violation of the basic human rights of Alan and Paul Sell of Cardiff and Jamie Humphries of Bridgend in the failure of the Spanish judicial authorities, having arrested them at Calella near Barcelona on 30th May 1991 and imprisoned them ever since, to bring them to trial; and calls on the Foreign Secretary to press the Spanish authorities to ensure that there are no futher delays in bringing this matter to trial, now that 5th May has been set as the date, following the aborting on the day of the trial of the two previous trials arranged in November 1992, and March 1993, since this entire long drawn out legal case has already amply proved the truth of the age-old maxim that justice delayed is justice denied.]

It refers to the imprisonment without trial of my constituents Alan and Paul Sell and the constituent of my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) Jamie Humphries in the youth prison in Barcelona. They will have been imprisoned without trial for two years on 30 May.

Will the Leader of the House ask the Foreign Secretary to make a statement to the House on how he intends to draw the attention of the Spanish authorities in Britain to the strength of feeling in south Wales that justice delayed to those three young men from south Wales is justice denied, and a gross violation of human rights?

Mr. Newton: The House will well understand the anxiety that has led the hon. Gentleman to raise that point. Happily, as he observed, those to whom his question was directed are here to listen to it. I am sure that they will respond appropriately. The Government as a whole well understand the anxiety expressed in his motion. We hope that the trial will go ahead on 5 May. If it does not, we shall consider with the lawyers of the defendants what action is in their best interests.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): I support the calls today for a debate on foreign trade, which is so necessary to the opportunities for Britain. During that debate, could we highlight the rapid growth of many of the economies of Latin America, which qualifies those countries for the introduction or extension of the Export Credits Guarantee Department limits, and above all the importance of our diplomatic missions overseas and the support which they give to our traders?

Mr. Newton: I join my hon. Friend, especially in the presence of my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary, in what I take to be a tribute to the increasingly valuable work done by many of our Foreign and Commonwealth Office officials in many countries throughout the world. I am sure that my right hon. Friend will also have noted the other parts of my hon. Friend's question.

Mr. Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield): When the Leader of the House discusses with his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health the request of my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) for a statement on the West Midlands regional health authority, will he draw to her attention the urgency of the case, and stress that millions of pounds of public money is being wasted and that the obligation of district health authorities remains? Top executives have been awarded golden handshakes running into thousands of pounds——

Madam Speaker: Order. These are questions about next week's business. All hon. Members should put their question briskly and pointedly to the Leader of the House.

Mr. Burden: I am sorry. During the statement next week which I hope that the Leader of the House will press the Secretary of State for Health to make, will he also draw it to her attention that the reports considered by the Public Accounts Committee were different from those distributed to the public? If the Government are to retain any credibility, we need a statement on the matter next week.

Mr. Newton: Will that do, Madam Speaker? I must make it clear that I did not undertake to ensure that a statement was made next week. I observed that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health would be here on Tuesday 4 May to answer questions. As I said in response to the right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett), I will bring the points about West Midlands regional health authority to my right hon. Friend's attention.

Mr. John D. Taylor (Strangford): Many of us are worried that, if the United Kingdom became involved in air attacks on any of the combatants in Bosnia, our troops from the Cheshire Regiment and Royal Irish Regiment would be put at risk. Can the Leader of the House assure us that we shall have a full debate next Thursday on Bosnia before the United Kingdom commits itself to any attacks in Bosnia?

Mr. Newton: The right hon. Gentleman will recognise that any Government in such circumstances must reserve the right to take judgments according to those circumstances. However, part of the purpose of having a debate is to allow the House to express its views before too many more developments have occurred.

Mr. John Denham (Southampton, Itchen): I am sure that, when the Leader of the House turned the tap on for his bath this morning, water came out. He will recognise that that puts him in a much better position than the thousands of people who have been disconnected from their supply by the privatised water companies. I am sure that that will make him sympathetic to my call for a statement next week about the growing number of water disconnections.

The Southern water company in my area has made a record number of disconnections. It is disconnecting families with young children, elderly people and people suffering from chronic diseases. The House must have an opportunity to debate that scandal and to call for the prosecution of directors of water companies where disconnection leads to ill health.

Mr. Newton: The right course is for me to draw the hon. Gentleman's attention to the presence here next Wednesday of the Secretary of State for the Environment.

Mr. Cynog Dafis (Ceredigion and Pembroke, North): Bearing in mind the revelation this morning by the Newbury Green party that the headquarters of Blue Circle Cement was built on the site of a former privately owned nuclear reactor, that Blue Circle Cement intends to vacate the premises because nuclear contamination has been recorded on the site, and that this is the first occasion when a decommissioned site has been restored to use which is open to the public, will the Leader of the House make time available in the near future for a debate on that bizarre and disturbing state of affairs?

Mr. Newton: I cannot undertake to find time for a debate, but I can undertake to bring the hon. Gentleman's question to the attention of the appropriate Minister.

Mr. John Gunnell (Morley and Leeds, South): Will the Leader of the House tell us when we may have a debate on opencasting? The recent debate on coal properly focused on mine closures. Opencast was a second area where there was considerable difference between the recommendations of the Select Committee on Trade and Industry and the proposals in the report.

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman was kind enough to refer to the debate that we had not so long ago covering the whole range of these matters. Clearly, points relating to opencast would have been within the scope of that debate. I am sorry if the hon. Gentleman did not get an opportunity to raise them. I cannot promise that it would be possible to have a further debate on an early occasion.

Mrs. Barbara Roche (Hornsey and Wood Green): May I urge the Leader of the House to arrange a debate on priorities in local government spending, given the recent report that Enfield council is closing children's play-grounds while at the same time refurbishing its council chamber?

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): Why was the hon. Lady not here on Friday?

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend helpfully makes a point that perhaps I ought to have thought of earlier in relation to the question of my hon. Friend the Member for Erewash (Mrs. Knight). It is only about a week since a Friday debate was devoted to local government matters. My understanding was that the usual channels on both sides of the House had difficulty finding enough hon. Members to speak in it.

Point of Order

4.17 pm

Mr. Roy Beggs (Antrim, East): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. May I bring to your attention the remarks made earlier by the hon. Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall), during his support for integrated education in Northern Ireland? His remarks cast a slur on every Northern Ireland Member present who was educated at a Roman Catholic maintained school or a state school in Northern Ireland. I ask you to examine those remarks. In the event that the hon. Gentleman does not concede that he was suggesting that each of us is a loud-mouthed bigot, will you ask him to withdraw the remark?

Madam Speaker: Is the hon. Member referring to the Minister?

Mr. Beggs: No, the hon. Member for Hendon, South.

Madam Speaker: Does the hon. Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) want to make a comment? I will let him make it on a point of order, if he wishes.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): Further to the point of order, Madam Speaker. Nothing in what I said was meant to be a slur on individual Members. I am sorry that certain hon. Members may have taken it as such, because it was not intended in that way.

Madam Speaker: I think the matter is ended.

Orders of the Day

European Communities (Amendment) Bill

Considered in Committee [Progress, 21 April]

[MR. MICHAEL MORRIS in the Chair]

New clause 74

COMMENCEMENT (PROTOCOL ON SOCIAL POLICY)

'This Act shall come into force only when the House of Commons has come to a Resolution on a motion tabled by a Minister of the Crown considering the question of adopting the Protocol on Social Policy.'.—[Mr. George Robertson.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

4.19 pm

Mr. George Robertson (Hamilton): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Michael Morris): With this it will be convenient to discuss also new clause 75—Transferred Powers (Commencement)—

'No power transferred by this Act from the United Kingdom to European institutions shall be so transferred unless and until the House of Commons has had an opportunity to vote on a motion tabled by a Minister of the Crown relating to the incorporation or otherwise of the United Kingdom into the Agreement annexed to the Protocol on Social Policy.'.

Mr. Robertson: I understand that, although they have not yet said so, the Government intend to accept the new clause. That is interesting. It is not a concession, but a surrender. It is an admission by the Government that they have no majority and no authority on this issue and that they face defeat in Committee. Rather than face that defeat honourably, they have simply said that it does not matter.

I intend to consider the new clause in detail and to explain to the Committee and the sceptics perched on the Back Benches precisely what its effect will be and precisely how it will place them on the spot—on the horns of their ultimate dilemma.

This is a new debate, but it is hardly a new subject.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Robertson: I shall come to the hon. Gentleman in time.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Will he give way just once?

Mr. Robertson: Very well.

Sir Teddy Taylor: I promise that this will be my one intervention. Can the hon. Gentleman tell us how there is a dilemma over new clause 74 when the Government have already said that, whether we vote for or against it or chuck it out of the window, they will leave us in the treaty? What is the point of it?

Mr. Robertson: To believe the hon. Gentleman when he says that he intends to intervene "just once" is like listening to the right hon. Member for Watford (Mr. Garel-Jones) and accepting that his is the authoritative view of the Government.

I shall tell the hon. Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) precisely why new clause 74 is the ticking bomb. I hope that he will listen with great care to my conclusions, because he is wrong. He will be on the spot and I will watch him to see what he does.

This is hardly a new subject, but it is vital. The social chapter, the agreement attached to the protocol on social policy, is important to the fate of Britain and Europe. It should not be judged simply in the context of the treaty. It is important because it illustrates perhaps more graphically than any other issue the awesome gap that stands between the Government's vision and ambition for Britain and for Europe and that of all the other European Community countries.

The Tory party's lonely vision of Europe is of a marketplace alone and its myopic ambition is to dominate it by low wages, low standards and down-market, service-based activities. The market exclusively will matter to the Tory party. Commerce will count, money will rule and people will be kept in their place—at the bottom of the rights league.

Every country in Europe has woken up to the reality of the modern world—the terrifying competition to Europe and to Britain from the far east, Japan and even a dynamic and growing United States. All our European colleagues have embraced the philosophy of quality, skills, high standards and up-market, high value-added production. They see that as their only salvation in the new world. They look on in dismay and with disbelief at our Government making a virtue out of competing at the bottom, at the lowest level of any market.

We are fortunate that British business is increasingly rejecting that suicidal ambition and is looking for, and can now find, an alternative, practical set of policies from the Labour party to take the country into a winning and not a sinking position in Europe and the world markets.

This debate is about a totem, not a policy. The objection of the British Government to the social chapter is about Tory party unity and is not about the British national interest. In the Tory party, the conflict between national interest and Tory party unity has always been resolved by putting the British national interest second to the priority of keeping the whole shambles together.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): On the Labour side, there is absolutely no difference of view between the occupants of the Front Bench and critics over the social policy. If we are to have the treaty—I despise it and do not want it—we might as well have it with the social chapter.

Does my hon. Friend agree that whatever gains—there will be some, but not many—working people get from the social chapter, they will be offset by provisions such as article 104c, which will lead to much more deflation and unemployment, so that many people now in work may be out of work? When one is set against the other—the social chapter against article 104c and the rest—I do not see much gain for the people of Britain as a result of having the treaty.

Mr. Robertson: The fact that I do not agree will come as no surprise to my hon. Friend or the House. He has not persuaded his party colleagues, at national executive or party conference level, of his view. Although he is entitled to that view, it must be placed in that context.

Much was made in the debate last night of the decision of the Scottish TUC yesterday in favour of a referendum.

Much less was made—indeed, hon. Members were silent on the subject—of the substantive vote on Maastricht at the STUC yesterday when, by an overwhelming majority, a motion critical of the treaty was thrown out. That important fact should be on the record.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Some on the Conservative Benches are mystified about why Labour Members get so worked up about the social chapter and the opt-out. Supposing the Government changed their mind and signed up. That would mean that when the Europeans were trying to do all manner of daft things through the social chapter and protocol, British Ministers would be there and might be able to prevent them from doing those things. Because of our not being there, those things will happen and, through other routes in the treaty, will be imposed on the United Kingdom. So perhaps the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) should not be proposing the new clause but should leave matters as they are. The Government will then have social issues forced on them through the treaty, whereas if they are in the thick of things arguing the case, they will be in a position to oppose what is being proposed.

Mr. Robertson: For once in his life, the hon. Gentleman is ingenious, though not correct, in arguing the point. I have heard from Conservative Members the argument that matters will be forced on us, so we should not make a fuss about them. New clause 74 will give the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) and his hon. Friends a chance to vote on the social protocol and become part of the process by which members of the Government—not the Minister of State, because he will be abandoning the sinking ship once this is over—will be in there fighting for their corner and perhaps be able to do something about the bits of legislation about which we are speaking. Having provided the hon. Member for Northampton, North with that chance, I look forward, at the appropriate time, to being in the same Lobby with him. His ingenuity will then be confirmed and his wisdom will be on display.

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): I have a totally uningenious but better question for the hon. Gentleman; why are the Government making such a fuss about the social chapter?

Mr. Robertson: That is an extremely good question. The answer is as I explained—that it is a totem, an ideological figleaf designed in vain to keep the Tory party together. It has nothing to do with substance. The other European countries—irrespective of complexion, left wing, right wing or middle of the road—all think that the British Government are completely crazy to be making such an issue out of the social chapter. They think that it is plain, reasonable, uncontroversial, simple, straightforward and makes sense in the context of building the single European market. Therefore, the answer to the question can only be, and is, that the Government are fixated by the social chapter as a means—not a very successful one—of keeping the Conservative party together.

This is a new debate for which we are profoundly grateful to you, Mr. Morris, because the subject was debated before. As a debate, it is complementary to, but not a substitute for, the debate on 28 January which was, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) said, targeted on amendment No. 27. In the same way, new clause 74 is complementary to, but certainly not an alternative to, amendment No. 74—sorry, amendment No. 27—and what it means. I have always wondered whether, if we added the numbers together, we would arrive at a magical figure; perhaps someone will do that.

4.30 pm

I shall outline the differences between amendment No. 27 and new clause 74. My contention is that, although they use entirely different means, they are both designed to achieve the same ultimate objective on behalf of the British people: the accession of the United Kingdom to the social chapter—the agreement attached to the social protocol of the Maastricht treaty.

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): I agree very much with what my hon. Friend has said about the fact that we must have not just a business man's Europe, but a social Europe, a social dimension and a social chapter. Am I right in thinking that, as a result, my hon. Friend will be unable to vote for the Bill's Third Reading without the social chapter?

Mr. Robertson: As my hon. Friend knows, I am not in a position to announce a decision on that, because we will not be making a decision on it, yet my hon. Friend should bear in mind that if, by some means, the House chose to wreck the treaty or stop the process of the ratification of the treaty throughout the Community, the social chapter would die, not just for Britain—which has temporarily been deprived of it—but for the whole of Europe and any future Labour Government. My hon. Friend should consider his question in that context.

It is important for the Committee to understand the new clause and the fact that the Government, in a generous surrender, have allowed us to avoid voting on it. Amendment No. 27 will remove the protocol on social policy—with the agreement attached to it—from the Bill and, ultimately, from the Act. Therefore, it would remove the protocol from United Kingdom domestic law.

The Attorney-General and his mouthpiece on that occasion, the Foreign Secretary, came to the House and said, "So what, if it takes the protocol out of British law? It is a double negative and we are not part of it anyway". With a wave of an expensive legal hand, we are told that the treaty can be ratified, the Bil can be enacted and Parliament can be ignored. They said that amendment No. 27 had no legal consequences as we could still ratify the treaty through the royal prerogative, and Parliament's clear voice was not significant. With one flick of the monarch's pen, Parliament was confined to a mere talking shop. But the Attorney-General stil said that he wanted to defeat amendment No. 27 and the Foreign Secretary said that he still did not want amendment No. 27. They said that they still did not want it for the sake of neatness and tidiness, and asked us to believe that. We do not.

The reasons of the Attorney-General and the Foreign Secretary have nothing to do with neatness and tidiness, but involve something much more substantial. They still appear to be terrified by amendment No. 27, which mesmerises them. They are relieved each time that it temporarily disappears beneath the waves. They are uneasy each time it rises out of the waves again. Why is that? We know that it is because if the protocol on social policy is taken out of United Kingdom law, they will lose the authority that that protocol gives for the 11 countries of the Community to go ahead and use all the institutions of the Community—the Commission, the Council, the Parliament—which will continue to be paid for by British taxpayers collectively and by the other taxpayers of Europe, to make law that will apply to only 11 Community countries, not 12.

The Attorney-General says that that does not matter: it is outwith the treaty, like the common foreign security policy and the home affairs and justice policy. That is what we are being led to believe, but it is not true. If that permission is not enshrined in British domestic law, the Government of this country will be in a real legal stew, in a limbo of litigation and potential litigation in the courts of this country and in the courts in Strasbourg as well.

It is our belief—this is why we are interested in amendment No. 27, insist on it and are confident that it will be debated on Report—that one of the consequences of that legal mish-mash could be that the European Court of Justice or the courts of this country will say that, even without the protocol being enshrined in British legislation, it is impossible for the legislation coming out of the agreement attached to the protocol to apply only to 11 countries in the Community; it must apply to all 12 and, as a consequence of that, the people of this country will enjoy the legislation that arises from the social chapter and the rights and protection of the social chapter.

That is why we believe that amendment No. 27 is important, different and must be debated and decided upon by the House.

Mr. Michael Spicer (Worcestershire, South): I have been listening very carefully indeed to what the hon. Gentleman is saying. I understand the logic of what he says, but, if all that is true, why did Her Majesty's Opposition put down these extra new clauses that we are debating, which, leaving aside a whole lot of arguments, at the very least have confused the issue of amendment No. 27? At the least, they opened up the possibility that it would be assumed that these new clauses would be substitutes for amendment No. 27. What was the point? If amendment No. 27 is so important, why not leave it at that?

Mr. Robertson: The hon. Gentleman writes thrillers, and I once read two thirds of one. They are all based on highly convoluted and usually incredible plots. I do not know whether they sell. I do not know whether any other hon. Member has ever read one of them. The right hon. Member for Watford has, of course, because he is part of the same sort of conspiracy theory. He is right in the middle of the spider's web, although unfortunately falling off it at the moment.

The hon. Member for Worcestershire, South (Mr. Spicer) writes these thrillers—although they are not nearly so good, by any manner of means, as the fiction of the Foreign Secretary, which has been reaching very realistic proportions in recent days—and he wants to believe that there is some sort of conspiracy here. Alone among the sceptics even, he holds to that conspiracy theory, which he thumps into me every time we meet in the Tea Room. But he is absolutely, completely and totally wrong, although I do not know how he will ever be persuaded that he is wrong.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Robertson: I will give way to my hon. Friend in a moment, after I have disposed of the thriller writer.

Amendment No. 27 was tabled when the Labour party believed that it was the only way in which the Committee could deal with the social chapter. But along came two of the most senior Ministers in Her Majesty's Government, the Attorney-General and the Foreign Secretary, who told us that the outcome of amendment No. 27 did not matter because they were going to ratify the treaty come what may. We were told that the House of Commons could pass comment on amendment No. 27 and could therefore pass comment on the social protocol, but that it was of no consequence. The Government would notify Rome after Third Reading and Royal Assent that the treaty had been ratified and Maastricht was in place.

The BBC, ITN, The Times, The Guardian and The Independent all said that Labour's fox was shot and that Labour's chances of achieving the social chapter had gone. The press believed what it had been authoritatively told by the Attorney-General and the Foreign Secretary. At no point did we ever lose our faith that the Attorney-General was not telling the whole truth. So we tried to find a complementary way, an additional way, thinking at the time that amendment No. 27 was in the bank. It had, after all, been debated by the House. It stood in the name of the Leader of the Opposition. We had talked about it; we had said we would move it; it was in the bank. We looked then for another way to make sure that the people of Britain got the benefits of the social chapter.

Yesterday we had a long debate on the judgment of the Chairman of Ways and Means—I have no intention of going over it again. The deputy leader of the Labour party and the shadow Foreign Secretary have made clear why we disagree with the judgment, based as it was on the idea that amendment No. 27 and new clause 75 were alternatives, not absolutely different ways of achieving the same objective. That is how the dilemma has been created. If the hon. Member for Worcestershire, South wants to look for a plot or conspiracy, let him look along the corridor where the Chairman of Ways and Means sits, not at the Opposition Front-Bench team.

I shall tell the hon. Member for Worcestershire, South why new clause 74 is the ticking timebomb that I said it was and how it may blow up under him if he is not careful.

Mr. Michael Spicer: This is rather interesting. The Opposition are saying that they have been the victims, set on a false trail by the Attorney-General. The hon. Gentleman's case today has been logical, but he is also claiming that he went off on a false trail, trying to find other ways of tabling amendments because he had been duped by the Attorney-General—or at least led astray by him.

That is an extraordinary admission by the Opposition. Surely the hon. Gentleman did not need to take advice to know that amendment No. 27 would have the effect that he has described; otherwise, he would not have tabled it at all. It is extraordinary of the hon. Gentleman to claim that just because the Attorney-General said that amendment No. 27 was useless he had to rush off on a false trail. That is very weak opposition—or perhaps there is an ulterior motive behind all this.

4.45 pm

Mr. Robertson: There is no way in which I can ever persuade people who write mystery novels that the conspiracies they believe in are merely the product of their own tortured minds. There is no conspiracy. The Opposition are trying to get the social chapter for the people of Britain. If the hon. Gentleman wants to wreck Maastricht, he can do that with one amendment that takes out part of the treaty. That would render it impossible to ratify the treaty, so why did he and his hon. Friends table about 500 amendments if not to multiply the chances that one of them would be successful? Perhaps the conspiracy lies here: why are the Conservative rebels using their power so diffusely? Why are they scattering their shot across the spectrum instead of concentrating it forensically on the best chance that they might have of wrecking the treaty? We were just multiplying our chances and using two different ways of approaching the problem.

I do not know what the motives of the Conservative rebels are. They call themselves patriots. They can be described in many different ways. No amount of abuse that I could heap on them could resemble the abuse heaped on them by their fellow Conservatives. Neither do I care about their motives. Sometimes some of them seem to want to embrace the social protocol and chapter, although I know that the hon. Member for Southend, East has as much affection for the social chapter as he has for the "Kama Sutra", but supporting it occasionally seems to suit the rebels. [Interruption.] If there is another answer, I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will tell us himself. There is certainly some mystery about how he got his knighthood, but that has nothing to do with the "Kama Sutra". The motives of these Conservatives will have to be defended by them.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) rose——

Mr. Robertson: Here we go.

Mr. Salmond: We are speaking, of course, with hindsight, but does the hon. Gentleman now regret tabling new clauses 74 and 75, given what has happened? If Parliament is to be denied, as it unfortunately might be, a meaningful vote on the social chapter, does he think that he might regret not taking the opportunity yesterday evening of pursuing the social chapter by means of the referendum clause?

Mr. Robertson: I do not regret tabling new clauses 74 and 75 with my hon. Friend the Member for Ashfield (Mr. Hoon). Neither with hindsight nor with foresight do I regret what was done last night, but, with hindsight, I am sure that the hon. Gentleman bitterly regrets tabling on 2 December last year a new clause that made no reference whatever to the social chapter. Today he goes parading around Scottish television studios, going on and on about the social chapter, but it will be clear to the people of Scotland that the SNP has no interest in workers' rights or protections—but every interest in wriggling off the hook on which SNP Members have been dangling since the day thay voted with the Government on the Committee of the Regions.

Mr. Salmond: Where were you last night?

Mr. Robertson: I was voting against a new clause calling for a referendum, in line with what my party has been saying for more than a year. The hon. Gentleman tabled an amendment to that new clause last Thursday; he now claims that his strategy is the apotheosis of consistent attempts to ensure that the people of Scotland get the social chapter. They did not believe him last month about the deal done between him and the Government, and they will not believe him today either.

Mr. Marlow rose——

Mr. Robertson: I have given way generously to the hon. Gentleman, but the limits of my generosity have been reached.

New clause 74 is absolutely clear. There will be a final vote after this treaty has finished its parliamentary progress in the Commons and the Lords. There is, apparently, still some legal doubt about whether that will take place before or after Royal Assent—no doubt someone, somewhere will resolve the matter; it is not important—but before ratification of the treaty there will certainly be a vote on a resolution tabled by a Minister of the Crown considering the question of adopting the protocol on social policy.

Among the final provisions of the Maastricht treaty we read, under title VII, article R:

> "This Treaty shall be ratified by the High Contracting Parties in accordance with their respective constitutional requirements. The instruments of ratification shall be deposited with the government of the Italian Republic."

Like many people, I am uncertain why we have to deposit ratification with the Government of the Italian republic, which is experiencing certain problems at the moment. Indeed, it may shortly not exist or exist only in absentia. The treaty cannot even start its journey until Parliament has decided on the adoption of the protocol on social policy. I hope to be able to persuade the Committee of the merits of new clause 74. My hon. Friend the Member for Ashfield, who is one of its architects, will underline that argument. The conspiracy theory novelist has now left the Committee and will not hear the final chapter of the story. No doubt he has departed so that he can keep the conspiracy alive in his mind.

There will be a vote on the protocol on social policy before ratification. The cynics will say that, like the fault that they all perceived in new clause 75, which had to do with its preamble about the transfer of powers, the Government will simply ignore it. There may be some justice in that claim because in the dying days of his ministerial career the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the right hon. Member for Watford, who has been wandering the corridors, an activity which has filled most of his ministerial career up to now, slightly overplayed his hand on Thursday. I think that he was described by Mr. Ian McWhirter in Scotland on Sunday as too clever by half. The right hon. Gentleman did not simply say that new clause 75 would be accepted and that it was a great concession to allow Parliament to have a vote, but he started to imply that if there were a vote it would be ignored.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Tristan Garel-Jones): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Robertson: If the right hon. Gentleman will hold his patience for a moment until I have given him the case for the prosecution, I shall let him offer his defence.

In Friday's Financial Times Mr. Philip Stephens, in a story entitled:

[Mr. Robertson]

"Major squares up to social chapter challenge", said that the timing of the vote on new clause 75,

"left ministers free to float the possibility—fiercely rejected by the opposition parties—that at this late stage in the ratification process the government might simply ignore a defeat and press on regardless."

Of course, that may just have been in Mr. Stephens' imagination, although he is a man of some distinction, character and reputation, as I am sure the Minister would agree. Even The Guardian story on the same subject whose reporters went to the same Lobby briefing said in an article by Mr. Patrick Wintour:

"Ministers were also intimating that even if a majority of the Commons voted for the social chapter in the subsequent debate under clause 75, the Government would not be bound by that vote, or that the very next day they would defuse the issue by tabling and winning a motion of no confidence."

The conclusion of one Lobby correspondent that Ministers were floating that possibility might well be an aberration, but two distinguished Lobby correspondents carrying the story tends to suggest, even without a conspiracy theory at the back of one's mind, that that is precisely what was going on in the corridors last week.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The hon. Gentleman is repeating an allegation made by his right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) extending not only to me but to No. 10 Downing street and to my right hon. Friend. He cannot and will not substantiate it.

Mr. Robertson: Apparently Lobby briefings do not even exist. They are like the officials in the Box to whom we are not even allowed to refer. I withdraw any direct accusation and merely ask the Committee to reflect on the fact that two distinguished and normally reliable Lobby correspondents happened to come to the same conclusion.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I am telling the hon. Gentleman, as a matter of fact, that no such briefing was given by No. 10, by my right hon. Friend or by me.

Mr. Robertson: The Minister can take that up with the individuals concerned. If he is as outraged as he was last week and as he appears to be today, I presume that he has taken it up already with those people and their newspapers; otherwise hon. Members will be driven to certain conclusions. We have heard the Minister's views and his defence is now on the record.

Whatever Ministers or distinguished journalists have said about the deficiencies of new clause 75, it is now in the past, because new clause 74 is markedly different. New clause 75 had some ambiguities, which were pointed out by notable experts who wrote to us, but new clause 74 has no such highlighed ambiguities. It is absolutely clear cut and says that there will be no ratification until Parliament has made a decision.

I shall tell the hon. Member for Worcestershire, South and some of my hon. Friends who read certain newspapers why the clock is ticking in the bomb. The Minister agrees that a motion will be presented about the protocol on social policy. It will be open to the Opposition to table an amendment to that and, under the precedents of Parliament, the Opposition amendment will be accepted for debate. The Leader of the Opposition's amendment will make it clear that the Government will not have the permission of Parliament to ratify the treaty on European union unless they subscribe to the agreement attached to the protocol on social policy. That is the ticking clock, and it should be obvious to any Back Bencher or journalist.

The Minister of State or any other anonymous Minister who may have been briefing the press last week about walking away from decisions will not be able to say that they can walk away from that. The Minister said that he would walk away from the defeat on the Committee of the Regions when he wrote last week to the chairman of the Association of County Councils. His letter stated:

"Equally, the amendment passed on this subject on 8 March limits membership to elected local government representatives and I have told the Committee that we do not rule out that approach either."

The Minister is saying that the Committee has decided and that he will consider its decision as one of many options. However, the Government will not be able to wriggle away from a decision on an Opposition amendment to the motion that will arise from new clause 74.

Mr. Marlow: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Robertson: No. I said that I had reached the limit of my generosity with the hon. Gentleman and I am probably reaching the limit of the Committee's tolerance. I want to finish making my case and allow other hon. Members to participate.

That places the hon. Members for Worcestershire, South and for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman), who are in their places, in a spot. What will they do in that debate and who will they believe? They can believe me because I maintain that the Government, and certainly the Foreign Secretary, would not dream of walking away from the treaty, wrecking it for the 12 Community countries and taking all the opprobrium that would attach to this country from Europe and beyond, solely on the basis that their Parliament had decided to disagree with the social chapter opt out. They would rather sign up to the social protocol because, after all, it is not an issue of controversy for anybody else in the Community. The Tory rebels can believe me or they can make up their own minds or believe the Chancellor of the Exchequer, although I know that that is stretching their credulity to the limit.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Over their dead bodies.

Mr. Robertson: Dead bodies apart, let me tell the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends this. On 16 March, in the Budget debate, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the second or third most senior member of the Government, said:

"Nothing would do more damage to job prospects, not just in Britain but across Europe, than the imposition of further tax or regulatory burdens on employers. That is why this Government will never sign the social chapter."—[Official Report, 16 March 1993; Vol. 221, c. 170.]

He is the only Minister, of any rank, who has used those words. We have checked and others have checked.

If hon. Members believe the Chancellor——

5 pm

Sir Teddy Taylor: Always.

Mr. Robertson: The hon. Gentleman is in a small minority there, but I am asking whether he believes the Chancellor in this case. I should like to ask the Foreign Secretary, who is with us today—I duly compliment him on that—whether he agrees with what the Chancellor has said.

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Douglas Hurd): Perhaps I will have the opportunity to catch your eye later, Mr. Morris.

Mr. Robertson: The opportunity was there. Those were the words used by the Chancellor. The Tory rebels can look at them to see whether they believe those words or believe me. They have the choice, and they will have to make a decision. They will be on the spot. The decision will be for Parliament, and Parliament will make that serious decision. The bomb is, therefore, still ticking.

I have not devoted enough of my speech to the issues of the social chapter; perhaps I should have done, as they are important to our country. However, many of them were covered in the previous debate and if my hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead, East (Ms Quin) catches your eye, Mr. Morris, later in the debate, I hope that she will be allowed to comment on some of the views that will be expressed.

The issues are important. This is a new debate. These are new issues. This is a new clause. This is an historic occasion, although it is not attended by many Members. As there is to be no vote at the end of the debate, people have left the Palace of Westminster quicker than if they had heard the fire alarm. But the crunch will come later, not just for the Committee, not just for the House, but for the country as a whole. The social chapter matters to Britain. The social chapter, with Britain acceding to it, matters to the future of Europe. We have provided the means by which Parliament can give the social chapter to the people of Britain, and I hope that they will take it.

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) is obviously smarting under the bitter accusations heaped on him last night and in the small hours—that he should not be speaking for his party and that he was in collusion with the Government Front Bench—and he has tried to respond to those accusations. If it is any consolation to him, I can confirm what he probably wishes to hear: the Government feel that the hon. Gentleman has been deeply difficult and obstructive on procedure and substance throughout the course of the Committee. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] Well, look at the procedural votes on which the progress of the Committee has depended—the Liberal Democrats have been up and down and in and out of it, but the Labour party has been consistently unhelpful.

The hon. Gentleman's line, and the procedural delay on which the Labour party insisted, are causing increasing puzzlement and dismay among his friends in Europe, who are linked to him by his many past declarations, because it seems to them, and to us, that the social chapter is , for those on the Front Bench of the Labour party, the prime issue: the cart is more important than the whole, and it is more important to fasten the social chapter into the legislation implementing the treaty than it is to ratify the treaty. All the other elements in the Labour party's view of Europe, and in the hon. Gentleman's view of Europe, seem to become insignificant in his mind beside the absolute importance of loading fresh burdens on to British business through the social chapter and reducing job opportunities. That seems to be the Labour party's European priority.

The hon. Gentleman spent some time on amendment No. 27. All that I can do is to encapsulate and summarise what the Attorney-General, the Lord Advocate, the Minister of State and I have said in the past—that if the protocol were excluded from domestic law, it would still stand in the treaty. Britain could still ratify that treaty because the protocol imposes no burdens on the country which require domestic legislation. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will agree that that is a summary of what I have said—acting, as he politely put it, as the mouthpiece of the Attorney-General in February. That remains the position.

We took the line then, as we might do on some future occasion if need be, that amendment No. 27 is undesirable and, while incorporation of the protocol into domestic law is desirable for the sake of completeness and clarity, it is not essential. I do not think that I or my colleagues on the Front Bench have anything more to say about amendment No. 27.

Mr. Marlow: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend. If the House were to vote for amendment No. 27, it would be voting to exclude the social protocol. The social protocol says that European institutions, and therefore costs, can be incurred for 11 countries. If the House were against that expenditure, how would they then be able to spend that money?

Mr. Hurd: I can answer that point, on which I have corresponded with my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor). It would be possible, under existing legislation, to absorb those costs. I will read out the formula in the answer that I gave to my hon. Friend. If, as is probable, the administrative costs are included in the Community budget, the United Kingdom would charge its contribution direct on the Consolidated Fund under section 2(3) of the European Communities Act 1972. Payments to the budget are required by the own-resources decision and its implementing regulation and are therefore an obligation to make payment to the Community for the purposes of section 2(3). If, on the other hand, the Community budget is not used—we think that it would be, but we cannot be sure—any expenses would be met by voting moneys on the appropriation account alone, which is the practice for payments to other international organisations to which we belong. We believe—again, on legal advice—that there is legal scope for payment of the administrative expenses to which my hon. Friend referred, if there were any.

Mr. Marlow: I put it to my right hon. Friend again. The House has said "No, do not spend that money." How then, whether legally or in conscience, can the Government go ahead and sanction such expenditure when the House has said no?

Mr. Hurd: The House will not have said no. If amendment No. 27 or something to that effect were ever passed, the House will have said no to the incorporation of the protocol in domestic law. It would not have affected the treaty, and the protocol does not impose any obligations on the country which require a change in our domestic legislation. Therefore, although we have always made it clear that we find amendment No. 27 undesirable, its passage would not have prevented ratification of the treaty.

Mr. Denzil Davies (Llanelli): As I understand it, what the right hon. Gentleman has said is that the Community budget would take care of the administrative expenses if amendment No. 27 were carried. If only 11 of the 12 countries were under an obligation to make those payments for social protocol, how is it possible to use the Community budget when only 11 countries are under an obligation to impose the payment on the United Kingdom? That would not be a Community budgetary obligation.

[Mr. Denzil Davies]

Mr. Hurd: It is not clear that there would be expenses. Secondly, it is not clear how one would sort out administrative expenses from the other expenses of the Community. We are talking about wages and salaries, a portion of electric light bills, that kind of thing. In practice, it would not be possible to separate them out. The treaty is clear as to how that would fall. It is a reasonable arrangement and, as I have already explained, it has legal cover.

I should like to spend a little time on the substance. The hon. Member for Hamilton did not do so, and up to now I have not done so, but it is a crucial point and will become relevant if the new clause is accepted and we move later, as the hon. Gentleman said, to a debate on its substance.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Before my right hon. Friend moves away from the legalities, can he give the Committee the benefit of his advice on what the Government think the legal effect would be if the Opposition's new clause is passed and a motion is tabled? Does my right hon. Friend believe that that would inhibit the passing of the treaty into law?

Mr. Hurd: I shall return to that point before I sit down.

We believe that the exclusion of the social chapter from the amendments to the treaty of Rome, made at Maastricht, was an important negotiating achievement. We believed then that it would be wrong to accept what our partners wanted. We believe now that it would be wrong to do so. The arguments, which were pretty clear to us in 1991, have become abundantly clear to the world since then.

There should be a social dimension, which looks back to the legislation that this country has passed to protect workers against exploitation, to ensure their health and safety at work and to give workers some rights. The mechanisms are in place both in this country and all over Europe. But the state can afford those social costs, which face all countries, only if it benefits from a successful economy. Money has to be generated by the business sector, because we cannot legislate for increasing living standards. Competitiveness, therefore, is the key. It is precisely the decline in competitiveness and the danger to competitiveness in Europe which makes the case against the social chapter.

We shall continue to argue for and support a sensible social dimension for the Community, but it has to give proper weight to the different national traditions and, now, to the principle of subsidiarity in article 3b of the treaty. I ask my right hon. and hon. Friends, and also the Liberal Democrats and others not besotted with this matter, to remember that it would be foolish, given what is happening in the world economy, to propose an enlargement of the opportunities for centralising legislation in this area. It should be a question not of how to ensure precisely the same levels of social protection in each member state but of how to ensure that Europe can compete effectively on the world stage.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Give some examples.

Mr. Hurd: I shall give many examples.

The problem is not the extent to which jobs are moving from France to Britain, or from Britain to France—the flow goes both ways, and between other partners as well—but how to prevent jobs leaving the Community altogether. If unemployment is the biggest source of poverty in Britain today, the same is true across Europe. If we are uncompetitive, we create unemployment. European competitiveness is declining. Since the mid-1980s, EC exports in world markets have fallen by 3 per cent. In the 1980s, the Community had trade surpluses with the United States and Japan. These have now become trade deficits.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hurd: My hon. Friend applauds. I hope that he will continue to applaud all the way to the conclusion that no one on this side of the House can possibly support the social chapter.

On labour costs, hourly wages in manufacturing in leading Community countries are not much higher than those in the United States, but it is the high proportion of non-wage costs—of social security payments—that makes the difference. Those elements make up about half the total labour costs in Germany, France and Italy. In the United States, they make up about 25 per cent. and in countries such as Korea and Taiwan about 10 per cent. That is the main reason why overall labour costs in France, Germany and Italy are higher than in Japan and the United States.

Against that background, it is no wonder that industry is turning increasingly to manufacturing outside Europe. That should be the main concern of those responsible for either national or Community policies in this area. It has not been so, but it should be now.

5.15 pm

Sir Peter Tapsell (East Lindsey): On the level of unemployment inside the European Community, which is a matter of deep concern to us all, almost everybody both inside the Community and outside it takes the view that this very high unemployment has been caused largely by the opertion of the exchange rate mechanism, which is an essential instrument of the European Community and likely to continue to be so. Without going into the overall merits of the social chapter, the industrial costs that the Foreign Secretary quoted are extremely misleading. As I am sure he knows, in countries such as South Korea, Japan and Taiwan, corporations and industries provide an enormous number of social benefits for their workers—work security, housing, play schools and education both for children and for grandchildren if a breadwinner is killed. Those statistics do not appear in the national figures for those countries, so the figures that my right hon. Friend quotes are not comparable.

Mr. Hurd: Europe's decline in competitiveness—I do not believe that my hon. Friend will deny this—is an established fact. He referred to Japan. I am less concerned about Japan at this time than I am about the newly industrialised countries of Korea, Taiwan and Malaysia, for example, where the factors that he mentioned do not apply nearly so strongly. It is from those countries—the new tigers of Asia, as it were—that the main threat to European competitiveness comes.

Mr. Geoffrey Hoon (Ashfield): The right hon. Gentleman used the provision of social security to illustrate the difference between the European Community and the United States. As the protocol on social policy requires unanimity on social security, does he accept that that does not change in any respect whatsoever the existing treaty provisions which the Government support?

Mr. Hurd: The case made by the hon. Member for Hamilton when he answered, for example, the question put to him by his hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) was precisely that the social chapter would provide the opportunity for increasing social costs. That is the charm of it for the Labour party and the danger of it for people who see the unemployment dangers facing Europe.

Mr. Leighton: It is true, as the right hon. Gentleman says, that western Europe has massive unemployment and is facing zero growth, but that has nothing to do with the social chapter. As the hon. Member for East Lindsey (Sir P. Tapsell) pointed out, it is because of the exchange rate mechanism that there are extremely high interest rates. In France it is 12 per cent., with inflation at about 2 per cent., so the real interest rate is 10 per cent. Where can we earn anything like that? That is why western Europe is going into recession. In both the United States and Japan, interest rates are 2 or 3 per cent. That is the reason for the recession in western Europe. It has nothing to do with the social chapter.

Mr. Hurd: I have given facts and figures. My hon. Friend the Member for East Lindsey sought to qualify them as regards Asian countries, where social costs are carried by companies rather than by the state, but that does not undermine the basic argument. I do not ignore the exchange rate argument. We have argued it over and over again in this Committee. The exchange rate mechanism, as we know, was invented before the treaty of Maastricht. Because we have debated it over and over again, we know exactly the status of stages 1, 2 and 3 of economic and monetary union. I am not arguing about exchange rates. I am arguing about another danger—the danger to the competitiveness of Europe. That is common ground now among commentators, to a much greater extent than it was when the treaty of Maastricht was signed and when my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister achieved this opt-out. Statistics show that the rise of competitors in the far east has become more apparent in the intervening months, so the case against the social chapter is that much stronger.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South) rose——

Mr. Hurd: May I get on a little? I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman later.

I fear that the Labour party is in a groove on such matters, and does not listen to what industry in this country says, but at least it is consistent on the matter. The Labour party has taken that view all the way through. As I have said, its main activity throughout the Committee stage which is now coming to an end has been precisely to seek to impose those extra burdens on our economy.

I find the attitude of the Liberal Democrats more puzzling, because their leader was clear at the outset. A few days before Maastricht, looking ahead as is his wont, he warned that the social chapter could "lead to a form of Euro-sclerosis".

He said that it was

"a really worrying attempt by Europe to try to rebuild in Britain the things that we have dismantled over the last twelve or fifteen years".

He also warned—perhaps he went a little far on this point—that the social chapter would open the way for collective bargaining arrangements that were "too inflexible, too costly, and too rigid".

Despite all that, however, the right hon. Gentleman said that he would have been prepared to sign up to it at Maastricht.

The sceptical approach that the Liberals took to the social chapter at that time has changed. I hope that their spokesman will explain why.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Newbury.

Mr. Hurd: No, their attitude changed even before Newbury. I do not understand why the social chapter as a cause, and the amendments which flow from it, have become almost as much of a fetish for the Liberals as for the Labour party. I say "almost" because I do not think that it is quite so much of a fetish for the Liberals, who retain a wider view—I might almost say an exaggerated view—of the importance of moving towards a more united Europe. I ask them to reflect on the consequences of the social chapter and to ask themselves why, in view of their philosophy and of their leader's original analysis, they are now so enthusiastic about it.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Where are the examples?

Mr. Hurd: I have given examples of the reasons why I believe that, against the background of the economy of this country and of Europe, it would be great foolishness for us to throw away the arrangement that the Prime Minister negotiated, which is in the treaty that the House is considering and that the Government wish to ratify.

Sir Teddy Taylor: We have been asking in debate after debate, week after week, whether any Minister could give us any example of anything that the EC could do under the social chapter which it cannot do under the health and safety provisions of the Single European Act and article 101A of the treaty of Rome. As this is the last debate, and as the Foreign Secretary said that he would give us examples, may I plead with him to give us any example? Apparently the arrangements cannot apply to pay, and cannot apply to trade union membership. Can the Foreign Secretary, or anybody, give us any example of anything that can be done under the social chapter but not under the Single European Act? There is the 48-hour week directive and other things. Can he think of anything at all?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman's case is that those evils—he admits that they are evils—can come upon us anyway through the Single European Act and the health and safety provisions, but he knows that we resist those attempts. He knows from particular examples that we are perfectly ready to challenge that legal basis in the courts. It is true, as my hon. Friend the Member for Chingford (Mr. Duncan-Smith) said earlier in the Committee's deliberations, that there are risks. There have been cases in which things have been pushed through on a legal base that we regard as narrow and inadequate. My hon. Friend has argued that the European Court would sustain those cases. However, my right hon. Friend the Minister of State dealt with that argument by saying that one could no longer make that presumption about the European Court.

[Mr. Hurd]

I accept that the risk exists, and that there have been some cases, but my hon. Friend the Member for Chingford is really saying that because there have been cases of burglars getting in over the back garden fence we should leave the front door open and put a welcome sign on the mat—that is, that we should greatly enlarge and expand the danger of which he complains. I cannot see how that flows from his argument. The social chapter would substantially enlarge the risks and possibilities by greatly widening the treaty base on which such proposals could be made. That is precisely why the Labour party is in favour of the social chapter.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): May I remind my right hon. Friend of the interesting argument advanced by the Minister of State? He said that the European Court was a political court which had been affected by the new mood of the politicians in Europe, and also much affected by subsidiarity. He said that he would therefore expect the court now to be inclined to rule in a narrow—and, to us, more satisfactory—manner. That was an extremely dangerous thing to say because it suggested that the European Court was a political court. Although at present he approved of its political activities, he gave aid and comfort to those who say that the political mood may change in the future, and when other people complain that they wish to have the social chapter by the side wind, they will be able to use the political court to achieve that end.

Mr. Hurd: My right hon. Friend the Minister of State did not say that the European Court of Justice was a political court.

Mr. Budgen: No, he would not concede that.

Mr. Hurd: Then why does my hon. Friend suggest that he did?

Mr. Garel-Jones: He always does that.

Mr. Hurd: I was not present at the time, but I have read the exchanges, because they were rather important. My hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) seems to have become a master at putting words into other people's mouths, and he is at it again.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Hurd: No, let me deal with this point, because it is important.

Mr. Gill: I could be helpful on this point.

Mr. Hurd: I am sure that my hon. Friend intends to be helpful. I intend to be helpful too.

The European Court of Justice has jurisdiction over the treaty. It applies the treaty. Of course it has regard to what is going on around it—all courts do that—but my right hon. Friend the Minister of State refuted the argument that inevitably, at all times present and future, the European Court of Justice would be bound to be a centralising influence. He cited examples—two or three, I believe—of recent cases in which that proved not to be true. He was not calling the court a political court and he was predicting how it would operate in the future.

If, despite the wishes of my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West, the treaty is ratified and subsidiarity becomes part of the law rather than being simply part of the political practice of the Community, that would be more than a nudge; subsidiarity would be one of the basic treaty articles of which the European Court would have to take account, case by case. That is what my right hon. Friend was saying, and that is part of the reply that I give to the questions that I have been asked.

Mr. Gill rose——

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (Colchester, North) rose——

Mr. Budgen: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Hurd: No, but I will give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin).

Mr. Jenkin: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for giving way. I can remind the Committee exactly of what my right hon. Friend the Minister of State said:

"The European Court has, perhaps, traditionally been a centralising institution, expanding the powers and scope of the Community with what I might call purposive interpretations of the treaty. I contend, however, that there have recently been clear signs that the Court is sensitive to the change of mood in the Community".—[Official Report, 27 January 1993; Vol. 217, c. 1057.]

So the basis of the security of the authority of this House, by which the Foreign Secretary set such great store in yesterday's debate on the referendum, is dependent on the European Court's interpretation of the mood in the Community.

The Foreign Secretary suggested that the argument on the social chapter was like saying that if the burglar gets into the house once, he will always get in. My right hon. Friend can check the record if he likes, but following his analogy about the burglar's repeated attempts to get into the house, in our arrangements for setting up the opt-out from the social chapter we are letting the burglars into every other room in the house and expecting to maintain sovereignty in our front room. That is not a realistic prospect.

Mr. Hurd: What we are doing in the treaty—to pursue my analogy—is to raise the height of the garden fence through the article on subsidiarity that we have discussed.

What the Labour party wants to do—it cannot possibly appeal to any Conservatives—is say, "No, we actually want to leave the front door open and a welcome sign on the mat", so that all these provisions, however damaging and expensive, can be imposed by the Community.

5.30 pm

I will give an example. The agreement of the 11 on the social protocol allows for a wide range of legislation on social affairs, by qualified majority voting, which is far wider than in the present treaties. That is the whole point for Labour. In particular, it allows improvements in the working environment to protect workers' health and safety, working conditions, worker participation in decisions on working conditions, workplace facilities, atypical work, working patterns, employment rights, redundancy payments and unfair dismissal rights. There is a very long list. This is what I mean about leaving the door open and a welcome sign on the mat. It is a welcome sign for Community backing and validity to proposals along these lines, which go much wider than those in the existing treaties.

Mr. Marlow: May I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to a statistical fact? If you have a high garden fence, you are more likely to be robbed than if you have a low one.

Mr. Hurd: I do not know what the burglars are like in Northampton, but I will study my hon. Friend's proposition and change my metaphor, if necessary, to something to do with locks.

Mr. Budgen: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. Before the hon. Gentleman makes his intervention, let me say that, by and large, interventions have been increasingly long during the short time that I have been in the Chair today—with the exception of the last one. I ask that they be short and snappy.

Mr. Budgen: On 27 January, my right hon. Friend the Minister of State said:

"the court is sensitive to the change of mood in the Community"—[Official Report, 27 January 1993; Vol. 217, c. 1057.]

A non-political court is bound by precedent and law, but not by the mood of the Community. What my right hon. Friend was saying is that this is a political court because it is, in his words,

"sensitive to the . . . mood in the Community."

Mr. Hurd: My hon. Friend is a lawyer. Does he know of a court, in this country or elsewhere, which is not sensitive to the mood of the community? My hon. Friend should not wriggle in this way. He said that my right hon. Friend described the Court of Justice as a political court: that means that the court is either composed of politicians, or acting on the basis of political consideration. He now seeks to justify that on quite a different basis by saying that the court is sensitive to what goes on.

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. We cannot have semi-private conversations.

Mr. Hurd: I think I have made my point. My hon. Friend has moved his position substantially in the last 15 minutes, and he is now making the grave accusation against the European Court of Justice that it is actually sensitive to the world in which it lives, an accusation which is made—and should be made—against any court of law. I do not think that he has sustained his point at all.

Mr. Spearing: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hurd: I will give way to the hon. Gentleman, and then I shall bring my speech to an end on new clause 74.

Mr. Spearing: I am grateful to the Home Secretary for his characteristic courtesy and thoroughness. May I take him back to what he has called the "social chapter", although really it is the "protocol agreement" in the treaty? He said that there were three views on it. I suggest that there is a fourth—the exaggeration as to the damage on the one hand and the benefits on the other.

The "damage", as understood by my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson), is greatly exaggerated. Article 2.2 says:

"Such directives shall avoid imposing administrative, financial and legal constraints in a way which would hold back the creation and development of small and medium-sized undertakings".

Does not that requirement mean that the vast number of employed persons will not be within the requirements of the social agreement, and therefore the exaggerations of both the right hon. Gentleman and my hon. Friend will not be so great as they suppose?

Mr. Hurd: I am not sure what case the hon. Gentleman is making. He is speaking from the Opposition Back Bench. He—perhaps less than his Front Bench—has devoted himself, night after night, to forcing this change upon the House and the country. Now he is saying that the damage is negligible. What is all this about? Why is the Labour party subordinating everything to this cause if it is really of no importance? The hon. Gentleman has a wise influence over these proceedings, and yet he is contradicting and completely destroying the case made by his own Front Bench.

Mr. Spearing: So is the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman says that we are both exaggerating. I have made the case based on the competitive threats to this country and to Europe, based on the policy of the open door and the welcome mat that the social chapter would create for dangerous propositions for this country. In response to the persistence of my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East, I have given examples of what might occur.

Mr. Stuart Randall (Kingston upon Hull, West): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hurd: I will give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Randall: I apologise, first of all, for missing the beginning of the Foreign Secretary's speech. In relation to the burden to which he has referred, I had a meeting the other day with a number of directors of a large multinational company. They told me that they thought that the burden to which the Foreign Secretary refers does not really apply, because most of the companies with a modern management outlook actually did a lot of these things. They felt—this is an example of the attitude of that particular business—that we were making an awful lot out of nothing, and that it was nothing more than a political totem pole.

Mr. Hurd: That is not the view here or the view of the Confederation of British Industry, or that of people to whom I listened in Japan, Korea and Indonesia when I was there a couple of weeks ago. There is great anxiety there among European business men about the social costs that Europe is heaping upon itself. There is a considerable realisation among would-be investors and manufacturers in those countries as to where the costs lie and do not lie.

I hope that I have said enough on the substance to show that we are not afraid of this argument. We are not hoisting a white flag of surrender. We have no difficulty in accepting the challenge with which the proposers of new clause 74 present us. It is reasonable that the House should want the opportunity to vote on the principle of the social protocol. New clause 74, which we are debating today, offers such an opportunity. That is why we came to the conclusion that we should accept the new clause, as I advise my right hon. and hon. Friends to do.

We are talking—I think the hon. Member for Hamilton was accurate on this point, although I shall have to study exactly what he said in Hansard—about a vote after the passage of the Bill but before ratification. That will enable the House to vote on the merits of the social protocol itself. We believe in the opt-out, for the reasons that I have explained. Obviously, we have not drafted the motion that new clause 74 would require a Minister to introduce if the new clause were accepted. I do not know what the terms of the motion would be, but the Opposition and the Committee would expect the motion to reflect what I have been saying today and what my colleagues have been saying for a long time. The motion will reflect our view and we believe that that view will prevail.

I will not answer hypothetical questions about what we would do if the motion does not prevail, any more than a party leader on the edge of an election would answer the inevitable questions, "Are you going to resign, give up the leadership or throw yourself under a bus if you don't win?" No, we shall take this one step at a time, as we are doing. If new clause 74 is accepted, we shall abide by it. We shall move a motion connected with the question and we shall put our views robustly to the House between Royal Assent and ratification.

Mr. Michael Spicer: On a point of order, Dame Janet. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary was kind enough to say at the beginning of his speech that he would answer my question about the legal effect or impact of the amendment which the Opposition have said that they will table. Inadvertently, I am sure, my right hon. Friend did not answer my question. May he have an opportunity to answer it?

Mr. Hurd: I think that I did so——

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. I should make it clear that that was not a point of order for the Chair. Each member of the Committee is responsible for what he says or does not say. No doubt it may be possible for further information to be given at some stage. However, that is not a matter for a ruling from the Chair.

Mr. Salmond: On a point of order, Dame Janet. The Foreign Secretary is in danger of misleading the Committee. We all heard him say that he was not answering hypothetical questions about the passage of clauses. I do not know whether you were in the Chair at the time, Dame Janet, but we all heard the Foreign Secretary deal with and elaborate upon the same hypothetical point in relation to amendment No. 27. I am sure that the Foreign Secretary does not want to mislead the Committee by saying that he does not follow hypothetical arguments when he did so only a short time ago in respect of another amendment.

The Second Deputy Chairman: The same considerations apply as I gave in response to the previous point of order. That is not a point of order for the Chair.

Mr. Michael Spicer: On a point of order, Dame Janet.

The Second Deputy Chairman: Not the same point of order, I hope.

Mr. Spicer: No. My point of order is whether the Chair will give my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary the opportunity to respond. It was not so much the content of my right hon. Friend's speech or what he was going to say as a question of whether the Chair would allow him the opportunity to answer my question. That is a matter for the Chair.

The Second Deputy Chairman: I am quite sure that if the Foreign Secretary wants to intervene at some stage during another speech, he will be able to do so. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is well aware of that convention.

Mr. Robertson: On a point of order, Dame Janet. I crave your indulgence because I have an extremely important point to make. The Foreign Secretary has concluded his preliminary remarks. Although he is not prevented from participating again in the Committee, he concluded without answering one of the key questions to which the Committee wanted an answer and which it seems that the Foreign Secretary is now willing to answer.

In addition, earlier in this Committee the Prime Minister sent a letter to my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition in which he made it clear that the Attorney-General would attend our debates to help the Committee on matters, for example, in respect of the issue about which the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the right hon. Member for Watford (Mr. Garel-Jones), unfortunately misled the Committee.

The Attorney-General is here and the Prime Minister has said that the Attorney-General can advise the Committee. My question, which is an issue of order, is this: how can the Committee receive the information from the Attorney-General—or from the Foreign Secretary—in response to the crucial question whether the Government are going to accept the outcome of the vote that is consequent on new clause 74?

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman is pushing his luck. He knows very well that that is not a point of order for the Chair. He has made his point and I suggest that he now resumes his seat and allows the hon. Member for Wallsend (Mr. Byers) to have the Floor.

Mr. Stephen Byers (Wallsend): May I give notice to the Foreign Secretary and the Attorney-General that there will probably be an appropriate point during my contribution when an intervention could be made to address some of the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) from the Opposition Front Bench.

I do not want to delay the Committee too long in its final hours of deliberations, but I believe that certain things have been said about new clauses 74 and 75 which have been misleading and inaccurate, and they need to be clarified. I hope to clarify some of those outstanding issues in a few minutes.

The Committee must recognise that the Government's acceptance of new clause 74 does not come about as an act of generosity. It comes about as a result of the political reality the Government face. Had they not accepted new clause 74, they would have suffered another defeat in Committee.

5.45 pm

The acceptance of new clause 74 is a humiliating climbdown for the Government. We know that the Prime Minister wants to put the Maastricht Bill behind him and to look forward to a new future at the heart of Europe. However, new clause 74 ensures that, as the Maastricht

Bill leaves Committee, it has a very important item of unfinished business which the House and the Government will have to address at some point.

As the Prime Minister looks towards the horizon, he will see a dark cloud. That is the vote that the House will have on the protocol on social policy as part of the Maastricht treaty. The Prime Minister and the Government will not be able to escape that vote. As each day passes, that vote will get nearer. The acceptance of new clause 74 means that the Government have paid a high price in their endeavour to avoid a defeat on that clause.

As the Committee completes its deliberations, we know that there will be a Report stage, during which we hope to press amendment No. 27. I want to consider the relationship between amendment No. 27 and new clause 74, because I believe that that relationship is very positive and complementary. I hope that the House will have an opportunity to discuss amendment No. 27 at a later stage.

I am conscious that, when hon. Members and commentators have examined new clause 74, they have said that it does not mean very much, because the Bill will have become an Act and will be on the statute book. Therefore, what is the purpose of new clause 74? It is significant, because it means that the Act will not come into force until the House has had an opportunity to debate and vote on the desirability of the United Kingdom's incorporation into the protocol on social policy.

The Act will be a dead duck until we have that vote. The Act on the statute book will be full of fine words and good intentions, but it will have no practical purpose or effect. In many ways, that is a very fitting testimony to the Government's mismanagement of the whole Maastricht process. It will say everything, but do nothing. That is why new clause 74 is so important. It restricts the Government's ability to move forward to the final act of enforcement of ratification of the Maastricht treaty.

A number of Conservative Members and some of my hon. Friends wanted to know why new clauses 74 and 75 were tabled in the first place. They believe that the new clauses are not necessary, and that they in some way weaken our arguments about amendment No. 27. I believe that the reality is quite different, and I want to take this opportunity to lead hon. Members through the reasons behind the tabling of new clauses 74 and 75. Hon. Members know that, if amendment No. 27 is carried by the House, it will remove the United Kingdom's opt-out from the protocol on social policy.

Amendment No. 27 removes the protocol on social policy but puts nothing in its place. In the words of the Attorney-General, it is a double negative and therefore has limited legal effect. We disagree with aspects of that interpretation. We accept that, because of the procedures and rules of debate in Committee, we were able to take things out of the treaty and were unable to put things in. That was the ruling given by the Chairman. If amendment No. 27 is carried on Report—if we have the opportunity to vote on it—there will be nothing left in the Bill which addresses the issue of the protocol on social policy.

A number of hon. Members tabled amendments requiring the insertion of an opt-in—if one likes—to the protocol on social policy. New clauses 9, 68 and 69 sought to do that, but the Chairman did not select them. He did not give any reasons for that, but I understand that the main reason was that he agreed with the precedent that it is not for a national Parliament to insert additional provisions into an international treaty agreed by a number of countries. For that reason, the Chairman felt unable to select and debate any of those proposals.

We were unable to insert an opt-in provision in the Bill, so we had to find another device. New clauses 74 and 75 provide such a device. They are effectively procedural resolutions. Within the rules of procedure, all that we are able to discuss today is the question whether the Committee should have the opportunity to vote on the desirability of the social policy protocol. We will have a vote which will provide the Committee with an opportunity to express its view one way or the other on that desirability. We will then move to a third stage, at which, hopefully, the Government will reflect the views expressed by the Committee in the vote.

Instead of simply a two-stage process, we effectively have a three-stage process. We will have amendment No. 27, which deletes the opt-out; we will have a vote on new clause 74 and a motion tabled by a Minister—we hope that the motion will show that we do not want ratification to proceed without the social chapter; and then the Government will have to decide what they intend to do. In the third stage, the Government will decide how to react to the vote.

Mr. Hurd: I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman's comments about amendment No. 27, for the reasons that I have given. However, I agree with the rest of what he said. He has given me the opportunity—he kindly said that I could take it—to answer a question raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Worcestershire, South (Mr. Spicer) and the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson), who is no longer here. They both put the question in a legal form, but it is not a legal question, as the analysis of the hon. Member for Wallsend (Mr. Byers) is showing.

The question related to what we would do in certain circumstances after the debate on the substance, which new clause 74 provides for. I said that we would table a motion reflecting our views on the social chapter, as would be required on this hypothesis by new clause 74. We would debate that motion robustly and we would hope—as Governments do—that it will prevail.

The question is a political one. I am not prepared to answer hypothetically a question about what we would do after that. The hon. Gentleman has listed the sequence of events and has rightly said that, after the debate provided for in new clause 74, the Government should reflect on what they will do. That is correct, and that is what we will do.

Mr. Byers: I am grateful to the Foreign Secretary for his comments. He will be aware that the failure to clarify the position—he has been given the opportunity to do so—will create great difficulties. The worry that many of us have about the position in which we will be put is the potential conflict between the will of the majority of the Committee and the total determination of the Government to ratify the treaty at almost any cost.

There is a danger of a constitutional crisis arising if the Government fail to reflect the view of the majority of the Committee. I hope that the Foreign Secretary will use the opportunity, some time during the final few hours in Committee, to say that the Government will abide by the majority view of hon. Members on this issue. His failure to do so up to now is regrettable. Hopefully, he will reflect on the position and set out in a more positive way the attitude that the Government are likely to take if a vote adverse to the Government's position is carried when the House has the opportunity to vote on the motion. A motion will be provided if new clause 74 becomes part of the Bill.

There is no hiding the fact that, for Labour Members, the Maastricht treaty and the social chapter should go together. The importance of that has been stressed time and again. There are political reasons why we want to see that. It will benefit workers by giving them advantages and protection—that point has been well argued by my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton. There are legal reasons why we need to adopt the social protocol. If we fail to do so, there will be real difficulties. As a nation, we will be open to challenge on constitutional grounds. Our failure to adopt the social protocol will result in discrimination against workers and will infringe the European Community's competition policy.

The Government will be put in a farcical position if we do not adopt the social protocol. At the Council of Ministers, they will have to leave the proceedings when the protocol on social policy is debated: they will not be able to take part or vote. They will go back in when the Council moves off the protocol on social policy, and have to leave again when it is debated again. It will be a case of in and out—it will be a European version of the hokey-cokey. It will be a Brussels benefit for lawyers. Brussels will be able to challenge legally the fact that we are not part of the protocol on social policy. For those legal reasons, it is important that we subscribe to the protocol. There are overwhelming political reasons as well.

Earlier, I said that many hon. Members—and certainly members of the public—found the proceedings complex and difficult to follow during 23 days in Committee. One reason for those difficulties is the complex legal position that is involved in the ratification of international treaties. Governments and Parliaments have distinct roles in the ratification process. The different roles and responsibilities have often been difficult for hon. Members to follow. Article R of the treaty clearly states that it is for each high contracting party to ratify after going through its own constitutional requirements.

That then raises the question: what exactly are the constitutional requirements for the United Kingdom in these matters? The formal and legal position is that all international treaties are ratified by a Minister of the Crown: it is technically done by the Crown acting on behalf of the Government. Constitutionally over the years, the system has arisen by which the whole process is subject to parliamentary scrutiny. Indeed, when the treaty amends our domestic law, that must be provided for in legislation. Different responsibilities are contained in the legal relationship on the question of the ratification of international treaties.

The best and clearest explanation of the differing roles is expressed by Oppenheim in the leading work on international law. On page 1,227 of the ninth edition, it states:

"the expression 'Parliament has ratified' a certain treaty, though occasionally met with, is objectionable when used of a British treaty. Parliament, if invited to do so, may authorise the Government to ratify a treaty, but it is the Crown, upon the advice of ministers responsible, which ratifies a treaty. Legislation may be necessary to give effect to the treaty, but that is not ratification."

The crucial point is that Parliament, if invited to do so, may authorise the Government to ratify. But it is the Crown which ratifies a treaty. That is why the Secretary of State must clarify this evening exactly what the Government's response would be to an adverse vote—as they would see it—on a motion tabled by a Minister.

The Crown will act on the advice of Ministers. The Committee should be told exactly what advice the Crown will receive from Ministers if they are defeated when the substance of new clause 74 comes before the House.

6 pm

Mr. Marlow: The position is clear. Hon. Members have already referred to the comments of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Government are a seamless web. They will have no truck with the social chapter. It is clear that, if the social chapter was imposed by means of a motion and an Opposition amendment at a future date, the Government would not be able to ratify the treaty. That is why it is a mystery to Conservative Members why the Opposition are pressing the amendment. We are happy for the new clause to go through, but the Opposition must realise that there is a real risk that, if it does, it will prevent the ratification of the treaty, and it will be their fault.

Mr. Byers: I obviously have not explained sufficiently fully and clearly the legal position on ratification of international treaties. It will be for the Government to ratify. That is the position. The Government could ratify the treaty and ignore the will of Parliament, if they chose to do so.

Indeed, it is interesting to note that the Bill before the Committee does not seek the view of Parliament on ratification. The Government could have worded the Bill to seek the view of Parliament. They have not done so. They have not allowed Parliament to express its view on ratification or any conditions which the House may want to impose on ratification. The Government have failed to do that.

However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton said from the Labour Front Bench, the Labour party will provide the House with such an opportunity, because an amendment to the motion moved by a Minister will allow the House to express a view. As I understand it, it will be worded in such a way as to disallow ratification unless the social chapter is included in the provisions before the House. That is the position as we see it.

We are aware that the Government have sought legal advice on many occasions. Many of us are genuinely worried that they may seek to defy the will of the majority of the House by arguing narrowly and legalistically that ratification is solely a matter for the Government and not subject to the will of Parliament or its approval. That is why we seek clarification. We seek the views of Ministers this evening on whether the Government will abide by the wishes of the majority of the House of Commons.

The Foreign Secretary failed to answer that question earlier this evening. There is a real worry that, if the Government are prepared to ratify the treaty at any cost, they will create a constitutional crisis. The Government will advise the Crown on whether ratification should take place. What advice will they give the Crown if they have just lost a vote on a Labour amendment which says that ratification should not go ahead without the social chapter? The Government are not prepared to answer one way or the other this evening.

The Crown would be put in an impossible position, with the Government of the day perhaps advising one way and a majority of the House of Commons expressing a view the other way. That must be clarified. The Government are condemned by their silence on the matter. That is why, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton said, the new clause is a time bomb ticking away. On a motion tabled by a Minister, the Government will allow the House a debate, but the Leader of the Opposition will table an amendment on which hon. Members will be able to vote seeking to place a condition on ratification.

We believe that the Government will be constitutionally bound by a vote in favour of such an amendment. They may argue that, legally, they can still proceed to ratification. That is the constitutional conflict and dilemma. We face a potential constitutional crisis if the Government ignore the will of the House on the matter.

It has been said that the way in which new clause 74 is worded deals an ace to the Government, because they will be allowed to word the motion that the House will consider. That ace has been trumped this evening, because we have been told how the Labour amendment in the name of the Leader of the Opposition will be worded. The House will have an opportunity at long last of voting on the social chapter. The Government have sought to run away from a vote on that key issue. There will be no hiding place for the Government on that issue, because the Labour party will table an amendment which will allow Members of Parliament to express a view. The Opposition are prepared to ensure that, in the interests of the British people, the House of Commons will hold the Government accountable.

Mr. Budgen: I hope that I may be able to persuade the Committee that the exchange between my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary and myself touched on a matter of grave importance. Many Conservative Members have made an argument based on the writings of Mr. Martin Howe and others who have examined the treaty with great care. They have said that, sadly, we are likely to have the social chapter by other means whatever happens.

We have then asked the Government to look at the way in which previous treaties have been dealt with by the European Court of Justice. We can anticipate that, when the mood of the court changes back to its previous federalist stance, we shall be caught. Therefore, I am unrepentant in saying that my right hon. Friend the Minister of State admitted on 27 January this year that the European Court of Justice was a political court.

Mr. Garel-Jones: My hon. Friend is an extremely distinguished lawyer—I should say my hon. and learned Friend. [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] He is not "learned", but he is an extremely distinguished lawyer. I hesitate to intervene on a lawyer of his distinction. He is what is known as a jobbing lawyer, so he is accustomed to the use of a certain amount of hyperbole.

I did not say at any point that the European Court of Justice was a political court. I observed—my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary and my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General happened to be on the Front Bench at the time—that the European Court, like our own courts, is part of the society in which we live. It takes into account the society in which it operates. My hon. Friend seeks to build an edifice that fits in with his fantasies.

Mr. Budgen: Sometimes jobbing lawyers have to cross-examine the accused by reference to the statement that he has made to the police. Jobbing lawyers are quite good at using the pompous phrases of the court. I would respectfully suggest that what the accused said on that occasion amounted to an admission of guilt in that he said it was a political court. In his extensive statement to the police he said:

"The European Court has, perhaps, traditionally been a centralising institution, expanding the powers and scope of the Community with what I might call purposive interpretations of the treaty. I contend, however, that there have recently been clear signs that the court is sensitive to the change of mood in the Community—even in advance of the ratification of the Maastricht treaty, which itself sends out a clear signal through article 3b; that article concerns subsidiarity, which we shall discuss later.

The court is showing itself to be increasingly sensitive to states' rights, and is giving increasing weight to the national arrangements."—[Official Report, 27 January 1993; Vol. 217, c. 1057.]

Mr. Garel-Jones rose——

Mr. Budgen: I will give way in a moment. I should be sad if I thought that I had in any way stung my right hon. Friend. He seems to have abandoned his laid-back Spanish attitude and is jumping up and down as though he had been stung. That saddens me. I hope that he will allow me to expand for a moment what I am sure he would describe as my fallacious argument.

Where a court, for the sake of argument, is in a state of being relatively unconstrained by legislation, with a wide discretion, for instance, in fining somebody or deciding what sentence of imprisonment should be imposed, it is ——to use my right hon. Friend's words—— "sensitive to the change of mood".

Mr. Quentin Davies (Stamford and Spalding) rose——

Mr. Budgen: I will give way in a moment. If, for the sake of argument, there has been a large number of burglaries in an area and the mood of the populace in that area is very much opposed to burglaries, it is likely that a court, in its relatively unfettered discretion, will impose on a person who has been found guilty of burglary a higher sentence, but that is not the function of the European Court. The European Court is partly an administrative court and partly a supreme court. It is important to understand that it has a quite different role from that of the House of Lords in its judicial capacity in our constitution.

Mr. Garel-Jones rose——

Mr. Budgen: I am sorry that my right hon. Friend is behaving as badly as I often do. If he could contain himself for a moment, I should like to expand the point.

If, for the sake of argument, the House of Lords is trying to construe a complicated piece of tax legislation under a Finance Act, it considers the law and the precedents, but emphatically it does not take into account, in my right hon. Friend's words, "the change of mood". It does not say, "We have construed subsection (b); we notice that there is a public sector borrowing requirement of £50 billion and that there is a major change of mood that people ought to pay more tax; therefore, we shall say that the appellant ought to pay tax under subsection (b)."

[Mr. Budgen]

If the House of Lords did that, it would, in my right hon. Friend's words, be taking account of "the change of mood". That is not the role of a non-political court.

6.15 pm

However, if the court is like a supreme court, it moves from being a body which merely interprets the law narrowly into something approaching a law-making body. Once it becomes a law-making body, it can be properly stigmatised as a political court. What my right hon. Friend is admitting is that the European Court has a law-making role. He is rather approving of its law-making role. In his opinion, its mood is moving towards recognition of the rights of the nation states. If it is a law-making body which is responsive to mood change, it might just as well move back into a law-making mode of a federalist nature.

Now I will give way to anybody.

Mr. Quentin Davies: My hon. Friend referred to courts unconstrained by legislation. That was the central part of his argument. My hon. Friend is all too familiar with the text of the Maastricht treaty. He will have noticed that one essential feature of the treaty is the principle of subsidiarity. That will constrain, for the first time, decisions of the European Court. The court will not be unconstrained by legislation; it will take account of the treaty. Once Maastricht is ratified, it will have to take account of the principle of subsidiarity. No change in mood, let alone any political direction, is required. The mere fact of subsidiarity will provide greater protection against Community institutions interfering in our national affairs.

Mr. Budgen: My hon. Friend ought to read the debates on subsidiarity. He is wrong about that. The importance of the subsidiarity element in the treaty is that it will be taken into account politically by the Commission. It does not have the effect of being legally binding.

Mr. Quentin Davies: It is in the treaty.

Mr. Budgen: No. It was put forward initially, mistakenly, as being legally binding upon the court. That is not so. It is a principle which will be taken account of by the Commission.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I assure my hon. Friend that he has not stung me, but I have a natural feeling of trepidation in discussing legal matters with a lawyer of his great distinction. To use the term that no doubt my hon. Friend uses when in court, it would be my respectful submission to the Committee that since my hon. Friend, having quoted me as describing the European Court of Justice as a political court, has now been good enough to read out my words, it is clear that I did not describe the European Court of Justice as a political court. I think that I went on to give three examples of judgments by the European Court in the last 12 months which, to me and, I think, to others, seemed to be more sensitive to the rights of nation states than perhaps has been the case in the past.

Mr. Budgen rose——

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. Before the hon. Gentleman continues, may I inquire how the arguments which he is deploying relate to the new clauses under consideration?

Mr. Budgen: Because on all considerations of the treaty, the central power, which will decide the interpretation of anything that we decide to ratify over the treaty, is the court.

It is unusual for us in our constitution to be so concerned about a court. When one has a sovereign Parliament one is relatively uninterested in the occasional ramifications of the courts which may have an effect on what one is deciding. Once one has a written constitution and something above it which is partly an administrative court and partly a supreme court, the role of that court becomes extremely important.

I do not want to be thought to be stung by my right hon. Friend's attempt at sarcasm; nor will I try to compete with him in sarcasm, but he has raised a serious point. By his admission that the court took into account the changing mood of the Community, he was thereby admitting that it was a political court.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving me the opportunity to intervene again. It is my contention that British courts also respond to changes in public opinion, not just on levels of fines, as my hon. Friend has implied, but through the establishment of substantial precedent. A good recent example of which the Committee will be well aware is marital rape. Previously, the decisions of the British courts had consistently held that a husband could not, as a matter of law, rape his wife. The House of Lords took into account the changes in public perceptions, or the mood, in our country and reversed that view—a decision which many hon. Members and the public regarded as wise. That did not make the House of Lords a political court, but a sensitive one. The European Court of Justice is also a sensitive court, as we would wish it to be.

Mr. Budgen: Sadly, Lord Denning is now retired, but everyone will know that he raised the whole question of what is the role of the courts by many of his judgments. Even he, at what might be described as his most heroic, never suggested that he had a law-making role. He described some of the judgments he gave as being vigorously interpretative, but he would hardly describe himself as having made the law. Under our constitution, Parliament is the place for law to be made.

The decision of our courts on marital rape was an unusually heroic one. It would have been a great deal better, however, if that decision had been made here in Parliament.

Mr. Garel-Jones: That is not a good point.

Mr. Budgen: It is a good point.

The Second Deputy Chairman: It may be a good point, but it is a diversion from the two new clauses that we should be discussing.

Mr. Budgen: I did not want to irritate my right hon. Friend and I certainly do not want to irritate you, Dame Janet, but, none the less, the role of the European Court in interpreting the treaty is absolutely central to our considerations.

My right hon. Friend said that that court was susceptible to a change of mood. Whether he thereby admitted that it was a political court is a matter of interpretation, but, by saying that, he admitted that it was a very, very dangerous court with innovative powers, which were likely, when the change of mood went the other way, to act to the disadvantage of the British nation state. Those comments gave aid and comfort to Mr. Howe and others who say that, in the end, the Community will get us on a single currency and the social chapter.

Mr. Hoon: The debate on the social protocol demonstrates the difficulties into which the Government got themselves by opting out of the social chapter. Every other Government in the Community regards it as a necessary vital balancing item in the creation of a European single market. The Governments of the left, right and centre recognise the importance of establishing basic standards of social protection in a single market where capital is free to move from one country to another.

Every other European country recognises the importance of establishing minimum standards instead of trying to drive them down. Every other European country wants to develop the skills and expertise of its work force, not to compete with far eastern offshore economies. That is why Labour Members believe that it is so important for the House of Commons to debate the subject again today.

I support new clause 74, for the drafting of which I was originally responsible. I have borne in mind the scorn that has been heaped upon it during the debate on Britain's opt out for the social chapter. The new clause has been described as a sell-out and a Trojan horse. It even provoked a distinguished political columnist of The Observer, who is in his place above the Chamber, to attack it two weeks running. In effect, new clause 74 led to the discretion exercised by the Chairman of Ways and Means in his selection of amendments.

Why has this rather modest proposal attracted so much opposition?

Mr. Marlow: The hon. Gentleman said that the social protocol would do something for the skills and expertise of the work force. Where is that mentioned in the social protocol?

Mr. Hoon: It has always been my view that the higher the standards of social protection, the better developed and better trained the work force will be. They will be able to develop and enjoy more expertise.

New clause 74 has attracted so much opposition because it displaced amendment No. 27 in which so much hope was placed by those who want to see the Maastricht treaty defeated. Those opponents should consider whether they are right to place so much hope in that amendment. It certainly appeared to be significant when the Minister of State bounced up and down and told us that if it were passed it would wreck the treaty. He repeated that assertion on many occasions. It is interesting to note how much more reticent Ministers have been today when expressing their view about the implications of accepting various amendments. Perhaps they have learnt from the right hon. Gentleman's unfortunate experience.

It was precisely because of that unfortunate experience that the Foreign Secretary and the Attorney-General were wheeled out to give the Government's definitive view about the effect of amendment No. 27. They both said that, whatever the result of a vote, the Government would ignore the amendment. The Foreign Secretary repeated that view today. Even if amendment No. 27 were passed, the Government would still go on to ratify the treaty. Whatever the supporters of amendment No. 27 may say in its favour, they must face up to that fact.

Whatever the merits or otherwise of the Attorney-General's legal advice—I have grave reservations about whether it was correct—we must deal with the fact that the Government would ignore amendment No. 27 if it were passed. What does that mean? For the opponents of the Maastricht treaty, certainly those on the Conservative Benches, it means that they would go off to the High Court and challenge the Government's position on legal and constitutional grounds. I would have no objection to such a course of action because I believe that it would be beneficial in clarifying some difficult areas of the law on the constitution. I appreciate why they consider that they have strong grounds for such a course of action. I suspect that they have had strong legal advice saying that the British Government should not ratify an international treaty where their domestic legislation to give effect to the terms of that treaty is at variance with the treaty itself. That is a basic proposition which, until the Attorney-General gave us the benefit of his advice, we were taking for granted.

6.30 pm

That would be the case if amendment No. 27 were passed. It would leave the matter of the social protocol in the hands of the courts and judges. That may appeal to the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash), a distinguished lawyer, but why should such an approach appeal to Labour Members? Why should they want to substitute what is essentially a political decision for a judicial one? Why should that appeal, for example, to my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner)? Would he trust the judges with the social chapter?

That is why it has been important for the Labour party —indeed, for the whole Opposition—to find other ways to tackle the question of the opt-out. That is why new clause 74 was drafted, and I invite all who still have reservations about that clause to look carefully at its drafting and consider its effects.

Mr. Marlow: The logic of the hon. Gentleman's remarks is that he would vote against amendment No. 27. Is that correct?

Mr. Hoon: On the contrary. I said that I would welcome the possibility of the legal and constitutional questions being resolved because, as I said, I have doubts about what the Attorney-General said. So I hope a way can be found to retable amendment No. 27 or something similar to it. I do not see that amendment as being inconsistent with new clauses 74 or 75. After all, new clause 74 says that the measure may come into force only once the Government have tabled a resolution on the protocol on social policy. So the Government would not be in a position to ratify the treaty without having had the debate.

The Government, and particularly the Attorney-General, should consider the fact that there is no specific commencement date in the Bill. In the absence of such a date, a measure generally comes into force on the date of Royal Assent. So it follows that any further debate on the social protocol is likely to occur before Royal Assent. Little turns on that, because that further debate must take place before ratification, since until the measure is in force, the Government will not have the necessary legislative underpinning in the United Kingdom to give effect to the international obligations in the treaty to which they have signed up.

[Mr. Hoon]

The fact that the Government expressed their willingness to accept new clause 74 led some commentators to suggest that the Government would simply table a motion on the protocol forcing their rebels to toe the line or to table a motion that, whatever the outcome, the Government would ignore. Indeed, the distinguished columnist Alan Watkins wrote last Sunday:

"The Government can so phrase the motion that even though a vote supporting the social chapter is achieved, there is no obligation to act on it."

That may be true of the Government's motion, but it overlooks the opportunity that Opposition Members would have to table an amendment.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) has been much derided for his description of new clause 75 as a ticking time bomb. There is a way in which the fuse on that may be ignited, and my hon. Friend spoke of a strategy that I had suggested to him. On the Government tabling the resolution required in new clause 74, the Opposition could table an amendment saying, in effect, "The Government shall not ratify the Maastricht treaty unless and until they have agreed at a further intergovernmental conference that the United Kingdom should be allowed to adopt the agreement on social policy contained in the protocol on social policy." The statement that the Government shall not ratify would be sufficient to prevent the Government from going ahead.

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): Is my hon. Friend aware that that sounds very like an amendment that I tabled initially but was not accepted by the Chair?

Mr. Hoon: I do not want to get into a debate about the selection of amendments—we have been through that already—but there is a distinction. I suspect that the amendment to which my hon. Friend refers sought to amend the treaty. The amendment that would be tabled to the resolution which the Government introduced in consequence of new clause 74 would not amend the treaty but would place a road block in the way of ratification. It would be a political road block—perhaps not legally and technically a constitutional road block—should the Government ignore the clear wish and will of Parliament. It would prevent them from ratifying on political grounds.

Mr. Barnes: My amendment could not, and did not, seek to amend the treaty, only the Bill.

Mr. Hoon: I am not familiar with that amendment. I was speculating on the reason why it was not accepted. In any event, he and I are at one in wishing to adopt the same course.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wallsend (Mr. Byers) quoted from Oppenheim's "International Law" and said that, if invited by the Government to do so, Parliament could authorise the Government to ratify a treaty. It must follow that, whatever the legal and constitutional technicalities of the matter, if Parliament specifically excludes ratification or, as in this case, makes ratification conditional on certain events, the Government should be bound to follow that.

If an amendment along the lines that I advocated were passed, I assume that the Government would have no alternative other than to be bound by its terms. They would have to face the dilemma that they have sought to avoid throughout the debate—whether to accept the social chapter or reject the Maastricht treaty. I suggest that they must now spend time considering that issue in preparation for the debate that we shall have in consequence of new clause 74.

I hope that Opposition Members, including the Liberal Democrats and the various nationalist parties, will work towards achieveing agreement on that approach and will see the benefits to the European Community of having a social protocol that extends to all citizens of the EC. If it is suggested that that is likely to be a difficult or time-consuming exercise, there is little doubt that there will have to be a further intergovernmental conference, in any event, to tidy up the details of the treaty consequential on ratification. Britain's adoption of the social chapter could be one item on the agenda of that conference.

Mr. Byers: I am interested in the possible wording of the amendment to be moved by the Leader of the Opposition to the resolution tabled by the Minister of State. Does my hon. Friend agree that the wording of the amendment to which he referred would effectively be a condition on ratification and that the condition he suggested—of the adoption of the social protocol—would not be acceptable to the Government because they would not allow it to happen? Accordingly, such wording might be attractive to Conservative Members such as the hon. Members for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) and for Worcestershire, South (Mr. Spicer).

Mr. Hoon: Certainly, we know that the Chancellor of the Exchequer made it clear that the Government would not accept the social chapter in any circumstances. It was perhaps significant that earlier today the Foreign Secretary, given a similar opportunity to give the Government's view, was more reticent than the Minister of State, the right hon. Member for Watford (Mr. Garel-Jones), has previously been. Perhaps the Government are now aware of the dilemma that they face.

The intergovernmental conference to tidy up the results of ratification in the various member states could deal with the issue as a simple and straightforward matter. We know that the other member states would have no difficulty in accepting Britain's agreement to the social chapter. In those circumstances, I hope that it will present no great difficulty for the Government to agree to such a course.

Mr. Marlow: In case there is any misunderstanding in the hon. Gentleman's mind, I should explain that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will have occasionally made comments about the currency in the ERM which can be overwhelmed by the market. Such events are anticipated—my right hon. Friend has to stand by the currency and the financial aspects of the country. But if my right hon. Friend the Chancellor says that the Government cannot embrace the social contract in any shape or form, we must remember that the Government constitute a seamless web. Whatever my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary said or did not say today, when my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer makes his comments, he commits the Government, and they cannot change their mind.

Mr. Hoon: There have been occasions when Ministers have made statements that have not necessarily appeared to bind all their colleagues. However, the hon. Gentleman has put his view with his usual strength of feeling.

I return to the issue with which we began our debates many months ago. All citizens in the European Community, other than United Kingdom citizens, will enjoy the benefits of the social protocol. Throughout the days and nights of debates on the Maastricht treaty, Labour Members have merely been seeking to establish the possibility of there being a vote on whether the United Kingdom should accede to the social protocol. With new clause 74, that possibility comes one stage closer. We shall have the opportunity of debate, the Government will table a motion, the Opposition will table an amendment and, thereafter, it will be for the Government to decide whether they will put at risk the whole of the Maastricht treaty or accept the social protocol.

6.45 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cirencester and Tewkesbury): Thank you, Dame Janet, for allowing me to catch your eye in the final debate—on new clause 74—in the Committee stage of the Bill.

When the social charter was first mooted in 1989, I wrote a letter to my local newspaper, which is as relevant today as it was then. On 31 October 1989, I said:

"It was quite right to focus on the type of Europe that will emerge after 1992, because it will crucially affect the British people through the next decade and beyond. The EC should only be involved in those areas of national policy where the 12 states acting in concert can achieve more than by acting as individuals. The Social Charter, which was discussed in detail, is one of the many grey areas which fall in between these two categories. Britain with her worldwide service industry has most to gain from the free and unrestricted corporate structure. The last thing we need is Jacques Delors, or anyone else in the Commission, telling this country how individual companies should be run."

In December 1989, the 11 members signed the social chapter, but the then Prime Minister, Margaret Thatcher, rejected it, because she could see that everything that had been achieved in the social sphere through the 1980s would be reversed. The panoply of union laws would return to the days of bad and restrictive industrial relations that we inherited in 1979. She could foresee that that would be the consequence if we were sucked into a European social dimension. She avoided that trap in 1989, and my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister did so again in Maastricht in 1991 when he negotiated the opt-out protocol.

When the opt-out was mooted, Jacques Delors said that it "would set a dangerous precedent, setting up one country as a paradise for Japanese investment".

If that is true, I plead wholeheartedly guilty. During the past 10 years, this country has managed to obtain approximately one third of all inward investment into the Community—50,000 jobs depend on that inward investment. I plead guilty to wanting to allow this country to set its own social agenda. After all, what have we achieved by privatising so many former nationalised industries in this country if not to allow those privatised industries to set their own conditions for their employees?

Mr. Hoon: I am sorry that I did not interrupt the hon. Gentleman earlier, but I must return to his point about Japanese investment. Nissan has invested in the United Kingdom, but it has also invested in Spain. Does the hon. Gentleman think that it is right that Nissan's workers in Spain should enjoy higher levels of social protection than Nissan's workers in the United Kingdom? If so, why?

Mr. Jenkin: That is a matter for the Spanish Government.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: As my hon. Friend said, that is partly a matter for the Spanish Government as the Government of the sovereign state where the company has chosen to locate, and it is also a matter for the company. If Nissan had wanted to locate in a country with different workers' rights, it would have done so. That is precisely why Nissan, Honda and many other companies have chosen to locate their headquarters and factories here rather than Spain.

As the hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Hoon) knows, because he knows the subject well, the Japanese have upheld good workers' rights in this country, and they were absolutely right to do so. That is one reason why they have been so successful. The hon. Gentleman and I have had discussions across the Chamber before, and what we want in this country is a high-productivity economy and a high-wage economy. We want individuals and individual companies to be free to set their own workers' rights.

Lady Thatcher was absolutely right to reject the social dimension in 1989, just as my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister was right to do so in 1991.

We have been told consistently by various hon. Members that opting out of the social chapter does not matter, because, under clauses 117 to 121 of the treaty of Rome, as amended by the Single European Act, it can be implemented in any case. A group of us visited the Commission a couple of months ago, and were told precisely the same thing. However, one crucial factor will have changed—we shall have signed the Maastricht treaty. We have held lengthy debates in the House, and there have been three referendums in other member states, so the Community, the Commission, the Council of Europe and the European Court of Justice will have to take cognisance of that process.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chingford (Mr. Duncan-Smith) has argued cogently that the preamble to the treaty of Rome and the Single European Act allows the European Court of Justice to pass judgments implementing the move towards ever closer European union. But page 117 of the Maastricht treaty makes it quite clear that the United Kingdom shall not take part in the deliberations and the adoption of the proposals made on the basis of the social protocol. It states that the agreement and attendant financial consequences other than administrative costs shall not apply to the United Kingdom.

I find it inconceivable that, if this matter goes to the ECJ for judgment, as it may well do, the court will be able to ignore that. It is all very well to say that, hitherto, the ECJ has embarked almost universally on centralising judgments. No hon. Member—certainly not I; I am not a lawyer—can prejudge what decision the ECJ will come to, but it will have to take cognisance of what is said in the treaty.

I do not believe that the Commission, or any other body, this treaty having been signed and ratified, will be able to implement those provisions of the social charter and articles 117 to 122 of the treaty of Rome, because what is written in the treaty will have to be taken into account. It is interesting to note that, of the 43 new initiatives under the social programme since it was introduced, 17 are legally binding and 25 have already been implemented by this country.

[Mr. Clifton-Brown]

So we now have two social chapters in Europe, one ratified by the 12 and the other ratified by the 11. When it says in the treaty that social chapter provisions will have to be implemented by majority or unanimity voting, or qualified majority voting, that applies to the 11 states, not to the 12. I have no doubt that lawyers will argue about this matter for some time to come, but I cannot see that there are any circumstances in which the ECJ can fail to take into account this enormously detailed ratification process.

If tonight we reject new clause 74, the treaty will be ratified by the Crown. If by chance we were to implement the new clause, we would have a debate on the social chapter. If we have a debate on the social chapter and that is rejected, the Government will advise the Crown to use its prerogative to ratify the treaty. But, whatever the legal argument, the House will have given a cast-iron statement of intent that it does not wish to be bound by the provisions of the social chapter in the Maastricht treaty. I for one will be looking to Ministers in this Government and to successive Ministers to uphold that cast-iron statement of intent to the best of their ability, so that we in this country do not get sucked into the social dimension of the social chapter.

Sir Russell Johnston: As has just been said by the hon. Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Clifton-Brown), the acceptance of new clause 74 would induce yet another debate on the social chapter later on, so I will be brief.

I will begin by giving two quotations, because one thing that is still a great mystery to me, despite the speech by the Foreign Secretary, is the reason for the Conservative Government's attitude to the social chapter of Maastricht. I still find it very difficult to understand why they are taking up the position that they have taken up. The speeches that I have heard have, in the main, been general and unspecific in arguing this case.

My first quotation will perhaps come as a surprise to the hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Hoon), since it is from his speech on 20 January. I thought it summed up the matter very well. I could easily have plagiarised it and reproduced it as my own, but I thought that that would be wrong. He said:

"I am sure that, if hon. Members tried to draw up a list of worthy causes, they probably could not do any better than the social charter. It would be difficult to imagine a set of people more deserving of protection and assistance. Yet, way back in December 1989, the Government found it impossible to accept that list, which forms the basis of the social chapter.

My argument therefore is that the list in the fundamental charter is already extensively covered by existing obligations under the treaty of Rome and the Single European Act and has been accepted by all the other European Community Governments—Governments of the left, coalition Governments of the centre and Governments of the right—not once, but on a number of occasions.

Why do the Conservative Government in the United Kingdom find it so difficult to go along with the views of their parliamentary allies in the European Parliament and their political allies on the continent? The German Christian Democrats have been among the most enthusiastic supporters of the social chapter, as has every other major political party on the centre right of the political spectrum in the Community."—[Official Report, 20 January 1993; Vol. 217, c. 458-59.]

That, I think, puts a very good question, to which I have yet to have a cohesive answer.

My second quotation is much shorter. It comes from a letter written to me by the Chairman of the Free Democratic party of Germany. The FDP are the political partners, as it were, of the Liberal Democrats in Europe. The Chairman is Graf Otto von Lambsdorff, who is also, incidentally, the President of Liberal International worldwide—a position that he will yield to my right hon. Friend the Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Sir D. Steel) next year. I mention this not simply to give my right hon. Friend the pleasure of reading it in Hansard, but also to demonstrate the closeness of our political contact.

Otto Lambsdorff is no political softie by any manner of means; he was a very tough and combative Economics Minister of the Federal Republic of Germany, and he is very committed to the free market. He said:

"British Government policy towards European unification seems to be ambiguous, reluctant and stubborn. Only the Liberal Democrats have a clear and comprehensive concept of European policy—and a clear and unqualified commitment to the Maastricht Treaty.

Liberal policy includes the social dimension of Europe. The FDP fully supports the strategy of the Liberal Democrats in wanting both the Social Chapter and the Treaty as a whole."

That, as the hon. Member for Ashfield observed a moment ago, is the general view throughout the European Community. It is not confined to Lambsdorff; one could easily get far more if one looked.

I have looked very carefully at the speech made by the right hon. Member for Watford (Mr. Garel-Jones) on 27 January in winding up our first big debate. Because of having given way extremely generously, as he did, the coherence of the speech was rather impaired, but that does not excuse the absolute absence of any argument about why the Government feel that we must be excluded from the social chapter, and why inclusion would be so damaging.

We are, of course, as the hon. Member for Ashfield observed, already committed to the social chapter of the treaty of Rome, as amended by the Single European Act. What is the difference between the social chapter of Maastricht and the social chapter of the Single European Act? There are some differences, and perhaps they are not entirely insignificant.

Article 117 of the social chapter of the treaty of Rome is fairly general. It is the one that we signed, and it says:

"Member States agree upon the need to promote improved working conditions and an improved standard of living for workers, so as to make possible their harmonisation while the improvement is being maintained."

That is fairly clear. Article 1 of the Maastricht social agreement as signed by the other 11 states extends this somewhat. For example, it speaks of "dialogue between management and labour" and

"development of human resources with a view to lasting high employment", and says that members should implement measures to take account of the diverse forms of national practices, and so on. So it is strengthened slightly.

The second main area of difference is that qualified majority voting is extended under article 2. Qualified majority voting is not introduced in the Maastricht treaty. It was introduced by the Single European Act, blessed by Lady Thatcher. Qualified majority voting is now extended from covering health and safety directives to cover working conditions, information and consultation of workers and equality between men and women in the labour market and at work.

References to equal opportunities for men and women appear in the original treaty of 1957. One must remember that a great deal of this is aspirational. It will not come into immediate effect, but it is what hon. Members have been pledging their allegiance to as a desirable objective. It will not have instant impact. Are those the things that we find intolerable and that would make our industrial costs so high?

7 pm

I could go on at length, but as far as I can see there is nothing significant in the chapter to which the Government might object. I understand that the Government might have reservatiions about the fact that the social agreement would enhance the role of organised management and labour in implementing European Community legislation. The Liberal Democrats have reservations in that area too, but such generalities would not lead us to throw out the whole lot. After all, the provision is at the direct request of management and labour, and I remind hon. Members that the agreement excludes pay, the right of association and the right to strike. The agreement

"Shall not prevent any Member state from maintaining or introducing more stringent protective measures compatible with the Treaty".

In other words, despite erroneous observations to the contrary, there is absolutely no question of dropping our standards. That was also misunderstood in the Danish referendum.

So what is it that is so unacceptable? I still do not understand. There is no doubt, as the hon. Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury virtually conceded, that the opt-out has created quite a bit of confusion. Officials in Brussels foresee great difficulties in administration. Two social chapters will be operating simultaneously. The hon. Gentleman recognises that that will mean fun times for jobbing lawyers. The Foreign Secretary, if I may say so, was not terribly specific. He said that social costs were too high in Europe, that that was reducing overall European competitivity and he argued that that will create unemployment—and that this must be avoided. We should have no part in it.

I find it unacceptable and undesirable that the Government have considerably weakened the situation of the low paid. The number of people in that category is increasing all the time. Consider a case described in a press release issued by the Inverness citizens advice bureau. The lady who manages the bureau cited an example of a family with two children, aged 12 and 14. The husband had been unemployed for six months. He had had an offer of employment as a security guard. Hon. Members would be wise to discover what sort of wages security guards in their own constituencies are paid, because sometimes they are appalling. Since we are in an employers' market, not only are the wages low, but often the conditions in which people have to work are unacceptable. That is what social chapters are for. They are to try to maintain minimum standards and not allow them to drop and drop.

The husband was offered a job as a security guard with a take-home pay of £88. In addition, he receives family credit and child benefit totalling £83. From this total income, he has to pay mortgage costs of £65, food, and band C council tax. If he does not take the job, the family will continue on income support, which gives them £122·95, plus mortgage interest payment of £52. The basic point is that, on income support plus other allowances, the family would receive £20 a week more than if the father took the job. The lady in Inverness tells me that the CAB has been seeing at least 40 clients a week who want to know whether they might be worse off working than they are remaining on income support.

The Government have told us a great deal about work dodgers on social security benefits. There is, however, no doubt that basic social security benefits are not high—people who say that they are are quite wrong. What worries me is the Government's general approach to the Community's attempt to introduce minimum protections. It is, after all, the responsibility of the state to afford such protection to the citizen.

The Foreign Secretary took time off to quote a speech or statement by the leader of the Liberal Democrats in which the latter criticised what he saw as the risk of Community-wide wage bargaining. That criticism still holds good. We were all rather quick to suggest that such bargaining might develop, however. I do not think it will, and it would not be good if it did—at least for a long time to come.

My right hon. Friend's criticism certainly did not imply a rejection of the whole social chapter. Liberal Democrats also do not happen to regard minimum wage legislation as the most cost-effective means of achieving protection against exploitative wages. We argue for minimum earnings, which might involve state top-ups, and which are less likely to have an adverse effect on employment. Such disagreement concerns how to achieve an objective, not the objective itself. It does not mean a rejection of the attempt to agree on a common structure.

This evening, I shall leave aside the potent argument developed by several hon. Members, most notably in a previous debate by the hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Duncan-Smith). That argument holds that competition rules, as enforced by the Court of Justice, will achieve the objectives of the social chapter if the opt-out produces the competitive edge that the Government claim it might. The upshot will be that we will arrive at the same objective in any event.

The Government came back from the Maastricht negotiations with two fallacies. First, they said that it was wonderful that the nasty word "federal" was not to be included in the treaty—not that that makes a tuppenny bit of difference to anything. Secondly, they said that they had opted out of the social chapter, thereby avoiding creeping socialism and corporatism imported from the continent. It was almost as if the Government thought that the social chapter had been devised to create mass unemployment and apply as many interfering rules and regulations as possible.

The purpose, on the contrary, is to ensure basic minimum standards of social policy all over the Community. I regard that as a good objective.

Mr. Quentin Davies: It is always a great pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston). I almost fell into the trap into which so many of my colleagues have fallen in these debates—of referring to him as a right hon. Member. He is always listened to with great attention. I often agree with his judgments on foreign affairs, but he will not be surprised to learn that I sharply disagree with his support for the social chapter.

I listened with considerable attention to the details the hon. Gentleman gave us of a family in his constituency who were earning more on income support than they would have been if the father had had a job. That should be a cause of great concern to hon. Members on both sides of the Committee.

My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary delivered a devastating critique of the arguments for the social chapter. I shall not repeat them. At a time when we should be increasingly concerned about our competitiveness vis-à-vis the rest of the world and particularly in relation to the emergent nations of Asia, Latin America and elsewhere, the European Community would be stark staring mad to do anything that would increase costs and reduce prospects for employment in western Europe.

It is absurd for well-known figures on the continent such as M. Calvet, the president of Peugeot, and Madam Cresson, the last French Prime Minister but one, regularly to say that, as the EC faces increasing competition from the far east and the Pacific rim, we should take protectionist measures to defend our industries. Almost in the same breath, such people endorse the absurdity of the social chapter which can only increase the gap between our labour costs and those of the countries that are competing with us.

Mr. Hoon: The politician that the hon. Gentleman cites is a socialist. Would he say that Chancellor Kohl was "stark staring mad" to accept the social chapter?

Mr. Davies: The irrationality at the heart of the thinking that has led to the social chapter deserves my strong epithet.

The Foreign Secretary did not deal with an even more essential aspect of the matter—that the concept of a social chapter fundamentally conflicts with trying to create an integrated single market. Creating such a market from 12 different national markets would mean bringing together areas with different levels of average productivity. The difference in productivity between the countries of northern Europe such as the Federal Republic of Germany, the Netherlands and the Scandinavian countries and poor countries such as Greece is enormous. If there are no artificial barriers and there is a single currency, for which the Maastricht treaty provides, so that fragmented currencies do not provide a barrier to trade within the integrated single market, and the same labour costs are imposed throughout the Community, areas, regions and firms with lower productivity will be prevented from competing.

As the Foreign Secretary said, in many cases the social costs can be 50 per cent. of total labour costs. That can only be described as crazy. An integrated single market will contain regions with different productivity levels, and regions and firms with low productivity will not be able to survive because they will not be allowed to use lower labour costs to compensate for lower productivity. That is a fundamental contradiction and unless it is rapidly resolved the Community will pay an enormous price. Considerable unemployment will be created in parts of the Community that will no longer be able to compensate for lower productivity.

I hope that in an integrated single market there would be considerable productivity gains everywhere and increasing convergence in productivity. But for that to happen there must be an inducement for investment in the lower productivity areas where factory costs and the cost of labour and land are lower. That new investment will generate higher productivity and, in time, an integrated economy will emerge. That is exactly the mechanism which has worked so successfully over the past 100 years in the United States of America. In the 1950s and 1960s, industry moved from high-productivity, high-wage areas of the Ohio basin, Chicago and the north-east to California and the west coast. In the past 20 years, the deep south, traditionally a low-productivity, low-wage area, has benefited.

If employers in Mississippi, Alabama or Louisiana had been told, "You must pay the same social costs and adopt exactly the same working practices as industries in Pennsylvania, Ohio and Illinois", investment would never have gone to the deep south. It would have remained the depressed area which it was for a long time and which it has markedly ceased to be. There is a fundamental economic contradiction at the heart of the suggestion that a social chapter can be combined with the ambition to achieve an integrated single market. That has not been mentioned in the debate, but I hope that we shall focus on it if we take a further look at the social chapter proposal after the Bill receives Royal Assent.

What is the origin of the thinking that produces that extraordinary self-contradictory proposal? It is the same as the thinking behind the double illusion that has led the Labour party and socialist parties in other European countries such as France to devise proposals such as the statutory minimum wage which is self-destructive and has now self-destructed. The first illusion is that we can legislate or regulate our way to prosperity. If only we could give everybody better working conditions, higher wages, and a higher standard of living by trooping through the Division Lobby I am sure that every hon. Member would do so enthusiastically. We could say, "Let benefits and wages be doubled, trebled or quadrupled." What a wonderful world that would be.

The second illusion sets aside the fundamental principle of economics that when prices are increased, demand is reduced. It follows that if the price of labour is increased, the demand for it will fall. If social or other costs are loaded to the cost of labour, fewer people will be hired and people who would otherwise be employed will be out of a job. Following such a course is economic nonsense and has the makings of human disappointment and tragedy. Those fundamental issues are at the heart of the debate and I am confident that when hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber, who usually believes in economic rationality, have considered them, they will, in their wisdom, reject the social chapter.

Sir Russell Johnston: I have been listening carefully to the hon. Gentleman. Nothing in the social chapter suggests, for example, that, in some mysterious way, we must compel the Netherlands and Portugal to have equal wages. It is not a question of producing overnight some standard, imposed solution. The hon. Gentleman is putting up Aunt Sallies and then knocking them down.

Mr. Davies: I am grateful for that intervention because it enables me to set right a common misunderstanding. Throughout my speech, I have been careful to talk about social costs. I did not talk about the attempt to harmonise wages. As we have already heard from my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary, in many cases social costs have got to the point where they represent at least 50 per cent. of the costs of labour—a significant element. I hope that the hon. Gentleman, who is a reasonable man—that is not true of everyone who sits on the Opposition Benches—will agree that the essential total cost of labour determines the demand for labour and, therefore, the level of employment, and that we must all be seriously concerned about that.

Mr. George Robertson: The Foreign Secretary's analysis was remarkable. The criticism was not an attack on the high standards of Europe in terms of non-wage employment costs, but a comparison between the Community and the outside world, a fair comparison to make. However the hon. Gentleman and the Foreign Secretary should reflect on the fact that of the countries in the Community that apparently, in the eyes of the Conservative party, suffer from a disadvantage vis-à-vis the far east, the people who are benefiting—the economies that are the strongest in the European Community—are those of countries such as Germany, which believe in high standards. They may have high social costs, but they are prospering and benefiting because they are investing in people and not simply lowering standards and harming the future.

Mr. Davies: With your indulgence, Mr. Lofthouse, I shall extend by a couple of minutes the time in which I intend to make my speech. I should like to deal with the two important points raised in those interventions. The hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber, who speaks for the Liberal Democrats, said that I should remember that the treaty does not lay down any specific requirements to increase certain costs. However, it produces a framework that makes much more likely that increase in costs.

The hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) demonstrated another common misunderstanding, based on an error into which it is easy to fall—confusing the chicken with the egg. The argument that he was pursuing goes roughly as follows: Germany has a high level of social costs and is a prosperous country; therefore, a high level of social costs cannot prevent a country from becoming prosperous. Germany had a prosperous economy and the highest productivity levels in Europe 20 or 30 years ago, when its socialist Governments began, in the 1960s, to build up the expensive social network from which Germany has suffered—or, if one prefers, has enjoyed—ever since.

When productivity gains are achieved, and a society or a state becomes prosperous, it is open to that society to appropriate those productivity gains in a multiplicity of different ways. They can be appropriated by increasing consumption, by increasing investment or by increasing what one might call social consumption—in other words, social costs and benefits. It has been possible for Germany to do all three, but that does not mean to say that if one starts simply by imposing on other countries the level of social costs of the Germans they will be able to compete at all. I fear that the effect of trying to extend German-type levels of social costs to lower productivity areas that are struggling to catch up and reach German levels of productivity and prosperity would be fatal to their chances of doing so.

When the hon. Member for Hamilton becomes a millionaire, he will be able to take his wife to Cartier to buy her some extremely expensive jewellery, or to buy a Rolls-Royce or a Ferrari, and still be prosperous. However, should he now, on his parliamentary salary, make the same purchases, he might end up in a bankruptcy court and never achieve a decent level of life in his old age. That is an appropriate analogy and the lesson that he should draw.

Mr. John Butcher (Coventry, South-West): My hon. Friend is putting forward an excellent case, but he may be understating it. In recent years we have seen diaspora of jobs out of Germany. The biggest recipient of jobs from Germany within Europe, in terms of its measured outward investment in the Community, is the United Kingdom. German industrialists are thinking seriously about the pretty pass that the on-costs of social legislation in recent years have brought them to. They have had 40 brilliant years, but they are about to undo all that, and we shall be the beneficiaries.

Mr. Davies: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who effectively reinforces my point. Even the most prosperous countries can over-extend themselves in the burden of social costs that they are prepared to undertake. As he rightly says, German industry and employment are suffering from that phenomenon. How much more disastrous it would be for the Community as a whole if the evil of the social chapter were extended throughout the Community and into this country.

Mr. George Stevenson (Stoke-on-Trent, South): My hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) has been reported as describing new clause 75 as a time bomb and new clause 74 as an iceberg. I hope that the time bomb will not blow up the iceberg. I am fearful of the Government's motive in accepting new clause 74.

Mr. Hoon: They are cowards.

Mr. Stevenson: It has been described as cowardice and a retreat. My hon. Friend the Member for Ashfield (Mr. Hoon) said that it put the Government in a dilemma. I hope that it does, but if there is one thing that I am prepared to accept about even this Government, it is that they are not entirely daft—nearly, but not entirely—and I cannot for the life of me accept that they are prepared to roll over and play dead on the whole issue of the social protocol.

The Government have consistently opposed the social protocol. They will not have it at any price. They must have been greatly relieved when the opportunity to vote on amendment No. 27 was not afforded to the Committee. To judge by their posture towards new clause 74, they would have us believe that it poses few, if any, problems for them. It may be that the Government have judged that new clause 74 allows them another opportunity to dash into a bolthole so as to avoid defeat. I do not know. Unlike my hon. Friend the Member for Ashfield (Mr. Hoon), I am not prepared to speculate about the Government's thinking. I have been disappointed many times in the past by their change of mind, because of the collapse of their discredited policies. I am not, therefore, prepared to trust them from this day to tomorrow morning. Others may speculate if they wish, but I am not prepared to do so.

Why is there this apparent contradiction in the Government's thinking? They are certain, I believe, that if amendment No. 27 had been put to a vote, it would have resulted in their defeat. Nevertheless, the Government are prepared to risk defeat by accepting new clause 74.

Mr. George Robertson: They have no choice.

Mr. Stevenson: I hope that my hon. Friend is correct.

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend is keen on amendment No. 27, but the Government have said that they will take not the slightest notice of it and that they will proceed to ratify, whatever happens to it. What good does that do Opposition Members, who are keen to see the social chapter enacted?

7.30 pm

Mr. Stevenson: I shall attempt to respond to that question in detail as I develop my speech. Again, though, I am not encouraged by the Government's determination to use whatever legal mechanisms are available to them to avoid defeat on amendment No. 27 or by their acceptance of new clause 74, which they believe will enable them to avoid what they have wanted to avoid all along—defeat at the hands of the House of Commons on the social protocol.

Mr. George Robertson: I should hate my hon. Friend to go too far down that road. If he looks at the matter dispassionately, he will see the Government's dilemma. If new clause 74 were put to a vote, the Government would be defeated, without any shadow of a doubt. Tory rebels could have voted for it in the sure and certain knowledge that it was meaningless at this point, because the crunch comes on the motion that is consequential upon new clause 74. The Government knew that they would be defeated. Having learnt the lesson of amendment No. 28 on the Committee of the Regions, the Government decided—as happened with new clauses 1 and 2 and amendment No. 420—to avoid defeat by not putting amendments to the vote.

The Government hope and believe that on the motion consequential upon new clause 74 they will not be defeated, because Conservative Members will not dare to vote with the Opposition for something so intimately tied to the social chapter. As I made clear in my speech, the Opposition amendment will make it clear that the treaty cannot and will not be ratified unless the protocol on social policy is adopted. If the Tory rebels vote with us, either the social chapter will be adopted or the treaty will not be ratified—they will make a choice and we will make a choice. That is what is in front of us as a possibility. The Government would face sure and certain defeat if new clause 75 were put to a vote. That is why they accept it, and for no other reason.

Mr. Stevenson: I hope that my hon. Friend is correct. As I develop my speech, if I am allowed to do so, I hope to make that point. Even if my hon. Friend does not accept what I say, I hope that he understands my cynicism about the Government's intentions.

Amendment No. 27 was not put to a vote. New clause 75 then arrived on the scene. After that, new clause 74 arrived on the scene. Many of us believe that new clause 74 is not an alternative to amendment No. 27. I must stress that fact. We must press for a vote on amendment No. 27 on Report. I realise that that decision is for Madam Speaker. There is a danger that if the Government accept new clause 74, as they have said that they will, the pressure for a vote on amendment No. 27 on Report will be weakened. If the Government hope that their acceptance of new clause 74 will remove the need for a vote on amendment No. 27, I am confident that Madam Speaker will note that possibility and will also note how important it is that there should be a vote on amendment No. 27 on Report.

The Government believe that if they table a motion after new clause 74 has been agreed to, they will—if they are lucky—be back in the driving seat, which will allow them to dictate the outcome. There can be every expectation that the motion will be carefully worded. It will probably be innocuous. The Government no doubt believe that the battle will then have been won. It will not have been won, though, for I do not believe that Members of Parliament will simply roll over and play dead and accept that sleight of hand.

It was only when the Government faced defeat on amendment No. 27 that we were told that it was irrelevant and was not a problem for the Government. If new clause 74 is agreed to and the Opposition amendment is adopted, the Government's position will become untenable, not for legal reasons but because of our position within the European Community. They will be unable to hide behind the Danish referendum, as they have done in the past, for the Danes want the protocol on social policy.

I am sure that hon. Members will be delighted to know that I am not a lawyer—I am not sure whether that is a benefit or a disadvantage—but after new clause 74 has been agreed the House will have an opportunity to demand that the protocol be accepted by the House of Commons and also to demand that it becomes part of the Maastricht treaty.

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Mid-Staffordshire): I am very much aware of the unemployment rates in Stoke-on-Trent, South. I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman went, as I and many hon. Members from both sides of the House of Commons did, to Nomura International bank two or three months ago. I remember one Opposition Member asking the Sony and Nissan representatives what was the single most important factor that kept them in the United Kingdom, as opposed to going anywhere else in Europe. Both of them said that it was because they could avoid the social chapter here.

Mr. Stevenson: Ah.

Mr. Fabricant: The hon. Gentleman then says, "Ah." I am referring to what the managing directors of the Sony and Nissan divisions here specifically said. I remember it clearly.

Mr. George Robertson: That is not so.

Mr. Fabricant: I do not recall the hon. Gentleman being at Nomura.

I do not understand the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Stevenson). He is speaking about various clauses and trying to impute motives to the Government, but at the end of the day——

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order.

Mr. Fabricant: My question is——

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. That was supposed to be an intervention, not a speech.

Mr. Stevenson: I am grateful for your efforts, Mr. Lofthouse. I was quite happy to try to respond to the right hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire——

Mr. Fabricant: Hon. Member. Right hon. next week.

Mr. Stevenson: I apologise. I meant the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Fabricant). I was quite happy to try to respond to him, but I am afraid that I was unable to determine exactly what his question was. I said that I was not a lawyer.

I believe that the Government's position will be untenable as a result of the acceptance of new clause 74 and, I hope, by the House's acceptance of the amendment that the Opposition intend to move. That will not be because the House will have accepted the amendment and the new clause, because during the debate the Government have shown their disregard for the opinions of the House: the Government's position will be untenable because other member states will not allow them to hide behind their opposition to the social protocol when the House has said something entirely different. I believe that other member states will insist that the Government accept the terms of the social protocol. As other hon. Members have suggested, that could quickly be done at an intergovernmental conference.

I am one of the Opposition Members who was worried about the tabling of new clauses 74 and 75 because I believed, and I still do, that the Government have been given the opportunity to slip off the hook. Why else are they accepting new clause 74 so readily? Perhaps too many Members of the House are prepared to accept the Maastricht treaty at any price.

My worries go to the heart of the treaty, because I believe that it and the Bill are seriously flawed. I say that quite openly, but I must make it clear that my concerns are not those expressed by Conservative Members who argue that we should not have the treaty or the Bill because of some outdated notion of sovereignty, and because they believe that their raw market philosophy is the way forward. A different concept and a different vision have been accepted by all the other 11 member states, and we should press for that. We should look for policies which enhance employment and growth in the EC, and we should insist on policies which promote social justice. We should not look to support a treaty and a Bill based on discredited monetarist theory. A positive social policy is essential.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton says that new clause 74 means that the crunch is coming. I profoundly hope that he is right, and I believe that he is. I have been discouraged by listening to the speeches by Conservative Members today, because they have made it clear that the Government's attitude has not changed one iota.

I hope that the acceptance of new clause 75 and the debate on it, which will include the other amendment that the Opposition mean to table, will give the House the opportunity to insist that the social protocol be incorporated. I use the word "hope" rather than the word "expect", but right hon. and hon. Members who want the social protocol to be incorporated will have another opportunity to vote accordingly.

Mr. Jenkin: I am grateful for having been able to catch your eye, Mr. Lofthouse. I follow the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Stevenson), and I believe that we must respect his sincere and well-argued view. He believes in higher social protection, but he, in turn, must accept that that incurs additional costs. If Britain can put itself at a commercial advantage by avoiding those costs, we can make our workers in this country better off in the long term. That argument is at the core of the debate.

I am grateful to my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench who have seen the Committee stage through night after night, and I want to pass on a message of thanks to them. They have put up with a great deal and remained courteous and responsive to all interventions at all times. I am especially grateful for the polite way in which they have continued to deal with me.

I am sorry that neither the Foreign Secretary nor the Minister of State is in his place, because what I intend to say relates to the exchanges that took place at the beginning of the debate. As the Committee will recall, we were talking then about what we are seeking to avoid; what measures we were not to have as a result of the opt-out arrangements, and what additional measures we would have to put up with. I want to talk about one of those arrangements, the European works council directive.

The hon. Member—I hope that one day he will be the right hon. Member, and perhaps even one day the noble Lord—for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) said how far away must be the day when there will be Europewide wage negotiations. He does not appear to be aware of the European works council directive. Under the current arrangements, even though there is a fairly strong social element in the existing EC under the treaty of Rome, we have managed to keep kicking that directive into the long grass.

Under the directive, a company with 1,000 or more employees in the European Community, with a base with 100 or more employees in two or more member states, has to set up a works council. The body is to be set up by agreement between management and employees, but where no agreement comes into force minimum legislative requirements will come into play. Those relate to a European works council's competence and its composition, and provide for annual information, meetings and consultation rights, with the cost being borne by the company. I am indebted to the Library for briefing me on the matter.

Briefly, the requirements are that there would have to be annual meetings of the management, to be informed of such matters as the group's financial situation, production and sales, employment situation and investment prospects. The council would have to be consulted about any management proposal likely to have "serious consequences" for employees' interests. Those would include relocations, mergers, reorganisations and changes in working methods—that is, all the things for which we in this country have a different culture.

Mr. Stevenson rose——

Mr. Jenkin: I give way briefly to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Stevenson: I assume that the hon. Gentleman will know that the proposed European works council directive, which he is worried about, is one of the priorities of the Danish presidency. The hon. Gentleman has made his views on the proposed directive clear to us. He rightly says that it is about information and consultation. If he is not in favour of that, presumably he is in favour of practices such as those employed at Dagenham, when Ford moved production to Belgium and told its employees about it by sticking a notice on the factory gates. Is he in favour of that method, or is he in favour of consultation?

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Gentleman would not know the advantage that I have in that regard. I used to work for the Ford Motor Company, which has its good points and bad points in the way in which it runs its industrial relations in this country. In the United Kingdom's experience, we do not have an enclosed legislative framework in industrial relations. It is culturally acceptable in other countries. They should be allowed to do their own thing; we should be allowed to do ours. That is what the opt-out from the social chapter is all about.

In the European Community there are some 900 enterprises with more than 1,000 employees that would be affected by the European works council directive, and subsidiaries with more than 100 employees. Approximately one third of those organisations have their headquarters based in this country, and half of the top 100 of these organisations are based in this country or are British companies. We have a lot at stake in that directive; it greatly affects us.

The Confederation of British Industry, which is in favour of the Maastricht treaty, has detailed all the objections to the European works council directive. It is opposed to the European works council directive because it fails to recognise the need for diversity in this area and the wide range of practice currently prevailing in the Community . . .

"fails to achieve its stated purpose of improving the provision of information to and consultation of employees in Community scale undertakings, since it would impose uniform structures on an area in which flexibility of approach is essential . . .

would introduce, a costly and slow moving process."

Some estimates have suggested it would cost some companies up to £1 million annually to implement the proposals. It could and would impact adversely on the employee relations in some companies where there is not that legislative tradition. Maybe consultation continues on a widespread basis already, but it is not legislated for, and that is what is different.

"It creates a forum for cross-border collective bargaining which could have arbitrary effects."

It would have upward effects on wages in the European Community, which would be bad for jobs. It

"concentrates influence in the hands of employee representatives".

That is a priority of the Labour party, but it is not ours. We want to concentrate power in the hands of individual employees.

So what is likely to happen as we ratify the Maastricht treaty? It has been our veto which has stopped these directives. Once the treaty is ratified, the European works council directive will go ahead in the other 11 member states. Fine, you may say; that is no problem of ours because they are imposing costs upon themselves. But what about those British companies that have subsidiaries in other member states? They are going to have to establish European works councils, and then there will be blurred edges—and the European Court of Justice loves blurred edges.

What about the status of the employment bases in the United Kingdom that should not be covered by this directive but is perhaps part of the arrangements of the directive that apply to other member states? It is a complicated and difficult situation to resolve. For example, if a company has one base in the United Kingdom and one in France, would the French implementation of the European works council directive mean that we would have to have a European works council? How would that apply? It would be in the hands of the court. How is the court likely to interpret such a position?

It is interesting to look at the thoughts of the Commission on Britain's opt-out from the social chapter. I quote from a speech by Mr. Padraig Flynn who spoke at the Copenhagen conference on the role of the social partners on 15 March. He said:

"The Charter sets out the basic elements of a future community social policy but we cannot ignore the fact that it has a flaw: it is only signed by eleven Member States and this fact foreshadowed the outcome of the Maastricht negotiations with the United Kingdom's opt out of the social chapter.

All of us sincerely hope that this is only a temporary phenomenon and that, in due course, the present or some future British government will feel able to reconsider that position."

So it is clear what he is looking forward to—that there should be 12 social partners.

Hoover, Nestlé, DAF-Leyland and Digital are the cases where President Mitterrand complained about social dumping. He stated:

"These cases raise so many issues that they alone could serve as suitable case studies for a dispassionate analysis of the problems of developing a coherent common market in which economic and social questions become virtually indistinguishable."

How, then, are we going to distinguish social policy from commercial policy—where we have majority voting and all the single market stuff which is put through by majority voting—when the person initiating the policy of the Commission is determined to make it indistinguishable from social policy? It will not be up to us.

Mr. Flynn then said:

"I think that the social partners have to pursue new rules and new approaches which can better contribute to the creation of wealth and the greater competitiveness of firms, the safeguarding of existing levels of employment and the creation of new jobs, and, thereby, to a significant and lasting reduction of unemployment. I intend to issue a Green Paper later in the year to open a debate . . ."

So the great social machine of Brussels is just about to roll out of the station again. Unfortunately, as the former Foreign Secretary Lord Howe used to say, we have put ourselves at the back of the van. We are nowhere near the driving cab because we have lost the veto on social policy by opting out. That has very serious consequences.

Mr. Flynn concluded:

"Social policy is a vital part of the process of union. I want to see it at the centre of the debate on economic and monetary union . . ."

That is getting muddled up with another issue.

". . . on convergence and on growth. It is not an optional extra or the icing on the cake. But it does put people first and that is what the Community itself must increasingly do if it is to attract the popular support needed for the next steps of integration."

Here we have a full-blooded federalist speech which is going to drive a coach and horses through the social chapter opt-out.

I wish to conclude by returning to that crucial debate which took place on 27 January about the way in which the social chapter will operate. When my right hon. Friend the Minister of State was dealing with the speech made previously by my hon. Friend the Member for Chingford (Mr. Duncan-Smith), he mentioned three cases. My hon. Friend mentioned these three cases in a subsequent speech about the court—and he dealt with them very well—but the story continues to move on. Nothing stands still in the European Community.

One of those cases was a very significant one. It was an Equal Opportunities Commission NICs case, decided in July 1992, of the Secretary of State for Social Security versus the Equal Opportunities Commission. The Equal Opportunities Commission was suing through the European Court that there should be equality of national insurance contributions for the purposes of state pensions.

I am told that all the advice was that we would lose. I understand that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services took the matter to Cabinet in order to get permission to go ahead with the case because the legal advice was that we would lose. But his excellent lawyers probably told him that this is a political court, and referred to the consequences of enforcing this particular law according to the precedents. We are talking about the equal treatment directive—79/7/EEC—which affected the Barber case. The forecast was that we would lose, but the Government inexplicably won.

The Government won because a derogation which had been constantly chipped away and removed from previous rulings was suddenly reinstated with a new importance. The reason for that was that if we had lost the case at the end of July, it would have needed an immediate and retrospective change to our social security legislation, the recall of Parliament to implement it immediately and a political crisis that could have severely jeopardised the ratification process in this country. The court, therefore, mindful of the political atmosphere—or the mood of the Community, as my right hon. Friend the Minister of State would say—took care not to cause such a political crisis.

Mr. Budgen: Before one pours too much scorn on that political court, I am sure that my hon. Friend would agree that it is important to recognise that if we have a written constitution with a very large number of constituent organisations belonging to it, we cannot easily make law. Therefore, we have to have some form of political body at the head as a supreme court with a law-making power. We complain about the political nature of the court, but it is inherently necessary for it to be a political body.

8 pm

Mr. Jenkin: I note my hon. Friend's comment.

In responding to the ruling made in July 1992, my hon. Friend the Member for Chingford explained that the case was a temporary aberration. He said:

"I feel that the case that I was discussing before the intervention was an example of the court marking time. It does not like derogations and never has. At best, it sees them as temporary and transitional means. However, that case followed closely on the Barber case, and just as the court was not willing to make that additional leap in the 1978 Defrenne ruling so soon after the significant advance made in the 1976 case". [Official Report, 24 March 1993; Vol. 221, c. 940.]

My hon. Friend explained why the court is likely to pause after a major ruling.

My right hon. Friend the Minister of State sets great store by the July ruling. He says that it clearly indicates a change of mood in the court. However, not one week after the debate in which the Government reiterated all those assurances, a ruling was given on 30 March 1993 in another case between the Secretary of State for Social Security and the Equal Opportunities Commission which came before the European Court. I am referring to the case of Mrs. Thomas and others in respect of equal treatment relating to invalidity benefits and the link with pensionable age.

The ruling refers to the derogation in the equal treatment directive, article 7(1)(a) of directive 79/7, which states

"according to which the directive is to be without prejudice to the right of the Member States to exclude from its scope the determination of pensionable age for the purposes of granting old-age and retirement pensions and the possible consequences thereof for other benefits."

The arguments deployed in that invalidity benefits case about men and women qualifying for invalidity benefit at different ages relates directly to the 1992 EOC—NICs, case. [Interruption.] I am grateful that my right hon. Friend the Minister of State has come into the Chamber to listen to this crucial point.

I re-emphasise the point that we lost the ruling on 30 March. The ruling provided in July was explained thus:

"it can be deduced from the nature of the exceptions contained in Article 7(1) of the directive that the Community legislature intended to allow Member States to maintain temporarily the advantages accorded to women with respect to retirement in order to enable them progressively to adapt their pensions systems in that respect without disrupting the complex financial equilibrium of those systems, the importance of which could not be ignored."

That actually says that the Secretary of State's victory in July 1992 was allowed because of a reason that the court invented to create a temporary derogation and not a permanent one. That is clearly stated in the ruling.

In determination of the case, the ruling continues:

"determining a different retirement age according to sex is only applicable if such discrimination is objectively necessary in order to avoid disrupting the complex financial equilibrium of the social security system or to ensure consistency between retirement pension schemes and other benefit schemes."

Therefore, the court has progressively introduced an entirely new basis for interpreting that particular derogation and it means to chip it away. My hon. Friend the Member for Chingford explained that process of incremental interpretation so ably in his speech about the European Court.

Mr. Fabricant: Given that we are going to adopt the Maastricht treaty, is my hon. Friend arguing that we should adopt the social chapter and protocol because we will have more influence in those matter or is he saying—as I believe he is—that we should not adopt it because the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development has said that the social chapter is the single biggest element responsible for producing unemployment in France? We have already heard that it creates unemployment, so what is my hon. Friend arguing?

Mr. Jenkin: I am simply making the point that the assurances that the Government have tried to give throughout this Committee stage cannot be guaranteed or taken at face value.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I hope that my hon. Friend will agree that I do not argue, and have never argued, that the British Government or any Government will win every case that comes before the European Court of Justice. In addition, I hope that my hon. Friend will agree that the case to which he is referring at the moment relates to the treaty of Rome as amended by the Single European Act. Presumably my hon. Friend is not making that a case for voting against the Maastricht treaty which, in a number of respects—there is no need to repeat the debates that we have already had on the issue—strengthens the position of member states.

Mr. Jenkin: I note my right hon. Friend's reticence to draw conclusions from rulings of the European Court when that does not suit him. My right hon. Friend drew conclusions from three recent rulings before the treaty was ratified. He used that as evidence that the mood in the Community was changing and that that was what was going to change the rulings of the European Court. That is what he said.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The difference between my hon. Friend and me is that I recognise, as I believe does the majority of the House, that we are signatories to the treaty of Rome as amended by the Single European Act. Unlike my hon. Friend, I do not regard that as a disaster for Britain and I do not regard the Community and its institutions as the enemy of the United Kingdom. I regard the European Court of Justice—and this point has been made extensively—as a court of justice manned by distinguished judges. I do not expect, and have never argued, that Britain will win every case. I simply made the point, for which I believe there is evidence, that recent judgments tend to show a growing acceptance and importance by the court to states' rights. I did not go any further than that and I never have done.

Mr. Jenkin: I have never said that our signing the Single European Act or acceding to the treaty of Rome was a disaster. I hope that my right hon. Friend will accept that and not attribute to me words that I have not uttered.

My right hon. Friend has been quite acerbic with other hon. Members on the same point this evening. I hope that he will also accept that I am not disputing the fact that we will lose some cases and win others. The point about the way in which the European Court works is the process of incremental revision. Earlier in our Committee proceedings, my right hon. Friend the Minister of State seemed to indicate that the tide was changing. I have just shown that the court is still behaving in its centralising way and is likely to continue to do that.

Mr. Garel-Jones: If I have placed words in the mouth of my hon. Friend that he has not uttered, that was not my intention. Naturally, I apologise to him. The case that he is making is based on the treaty of Rome as amended by the Single European Act. If he is making the case, he is steering a wayward course in this matter. Sometimes, it is difficult to know his position. If his position is that we should not ratify the Maastricht treaty—I do not think that that is his position—he is not making a case for it at present.

Mr. Jenkin: In Committee, my right hon. Friend referred to three cases which he adduced as evidence of a changing mood in the European Court. By quoting from those rulings, I am merely demonstrating that the court is reserving its position for future centralising judgments. Indeed, we have never said that the doctrine of the occupied field has been reversed and that we are moving away from the principle of the attribution of powers, which is the basis of the legal underpinning of the European Community.

Mr. Budgen: Does my hon. Friend agree that his point is not that he regrets the Single European Act or the treaty of Rome? All he is saying is that we are giving more powers to the European Community and, therefore, we should understand that the central and most important body in the Community is the European Court. Two things can be said about the European Court: first, it is a political body and, secondly, it has a track record for centralising and federalist decisions. The court is likely to be reverted when it becomes politically possible so to revert.

Mr. Jenkin: I absolutely agree with my hon. Friend.

Mr. Iain Duncan-Smith (Chingford): Does not the nub of the argument essentially relate to the clear problem of the way in which our opt-out of the social chapter will be viewed by those who are not necessarily influenced by the views of Her Majesty's Government? My hon. Friend is saying that the other 11 nations will use the European Court to implement and adjudicate their specific chapters and that, naturally, we will be sucked in by a bypass mechanism through the court.

Mr. Jenkin: My hon. Friend reiterates a point that was made in earlier debates: he is absolutely right. The purpose of my speech—I can sum it up in a few words—is that the derogation on which my right hon. Friend the Minister set great store in an earlier debate has been clearly shown to be a temporary derogation. In the ruling, we see the preserving of financial equilibrium as a completely new element to the ruling of the court, introduced only by itself. That is the danger with the way in which the social policy will continue to develop in the European Community.

My hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary set great store in last night's debate on the authority of the Committee and how it should not be interfered with. We are putting ourselves progressively in a position in which the authority of the House of Commons is simply being passed to alternative institutions.

8.15 pm

Mr. Barnes: I support new clauses 74 and 75 entirely, without having any illusions about what they would achieve. The social protocol does not necessarily mean that we have introduced a socially progressive set of measures or high standards in Europe. It is simply what someone has described as a framework or a set of possibilities in which various regulations and directives can be introduced later. Regulations and directives on a number of topics, such as the working environment, working conditions and information to and consultation with workers can be introduced—generally describing social in terms of labour and work—within the institutions of the European Community in different ways. They can come forward slowly or progressively. On occasions, they can be regressive and—to use another term—anti-social.

The way in which the provisions in the protocol will be used is important. I would like us to have the social protocol but I would like to see a different framework in which it could operate so that its provisions would begin to be interpreted in an improving and advancing way. We do not have a set of arrangements in the treaty that would allow us to do that.

We have what has been described by hon. Members, especially the rebels in the Labour party, as a treaty of institutions and their powers. Those institutions include the Commission, the Council of Ministers, the European bank and other institutions which are not subject to any democratic checks and controls and do not have established democratic systems in which to operate.

Many decisions are ratified by the Council of Ministers. I have tried to get the Minister to agree to publish information and records about the votes which take place in the Council of Ministers. At present, I must put down a set of questions, which are pursuant to planted questions, to get a report on which is going on in the Council of Ministers and the votes that are taken.

Yesterday, the Prime Minister provided information in an answer about the number of votes that had taken place recently. I wanted to know when the most recent vote had occurred in the Council of Ministers. At the previous 11 meetings, all the matters had been cut and dried and no votes had taken place. The most recent vote was taken by the Agriculture Ministers on the issue of bananas. Germany and two other countries voted against the proposal, and it was carried by that arrangement.

Far from us seeing what takes place in the Council of Ministers, we cannot see what has taken place in terms of voting and the decisions adopted. In the end, most matters are decided by deals done among people without qualified majority voting entering the picture or operating. Such arrangements are entirely unacceptable. We need to move towards proper democratic arrangements in the European Community. To do so would give considerable life to the social protocol.

It would mean that many items could be dealt with through the Community's institutions, and the best progressive standards could be argued and developed. The arguments about those standards would then become a matter of public concern. They would be in the public domain and in front of the democratic institutions. Democracy seems to be a much more important element in the production of social provisions than some technique, some device, some protocol and some handing over of measures to officialdom in the hope that things will be done on behalf of people.

We have a Europe that is looking for a set of Bismarks so that the Bismarks will come forward and do things to a reasonably high standard. I would rather have democratic institutions that did not give high standards because there is a chance of doing things in the future than rely on someone to grant me authority from the superior position that they hold. Developments are made only by having democratic institutions and democratic movements and argument.

In the United Kingdom, we advanced the social provision, which is described in a wider sense than being about only work and labour, through the development of our democratic institutions. For example, we moved towards elementary education through a Conservative Government in the late 19th century because more people were getting the vote and people were saying that we had to educate our masters and our work force, who were becoming significant. The House of Commons decided to introduce old-age pensions under the Liberal Government in 1910 when Lloyd George was Chancellor of the Exchequer. Labour introduced the provisions of the welfare state, which have been considerably dismantled in recent years.

Such use of democratic institutions to extend social provision is required within the Community. People talk nonsense about a federal Europe or a unitary, centralised Europe. There is a conflict between the notions that are expressed. We should seek to advance towards a fully fledged, democratic, federal Europe in which the division of its powers is described. Instead, we have a bureaucratic, developing, unitary system which takes more and more authority away from us without any democratic checks and controls.

Governments enter into deals. They might sometimes have to listen to their Parliaments. They are often able not to do so, and they hoodwink those Parliaments to a considerable extent. Parliaments should be involved in social provision. They do so only in so far as democracy is extended and developed. The provisions to which I referred came about thanks to the work of people such as the Chartists and the suffragettes. They achieved a universal franchise. In the preamble to their charter, the Chartists said that it was about improving social conditions. They wanted working-class men to have the franchise so that conditions could be improved. Unless we think about Europe in that way, we shall make considerable mistakes. So I support new clauses 74 and 75, but I have no illusions about what they will achieve.

The Government have adopted a peculiar position on the social protocol. On many occasions the Minister of State and the Foreign Secretary have told us about the fantastic advantages of subsidiarity. They have said that it is a democratic substitute which pulls power back to national parliaments. I disagree with them. However, according to the logic of their argument, they should be able to accept the social protocol because it is subject to subsidiarity. They should say that some aspects of Europe's social policies can be dealt with at European level, but many items such as directives and regulations will be subject to subsidiarity.

According to the Government's arguments, the social protocol should be acceptable. I do not accept their arguments, because I believe that subsidiarity is an absolute load of rubbish. It means anything that anyone wants it to mean. It allows centralised decision-making to take place. Therefore, the treaty does not have proper democratic arrangements built into it. We do not want subsidiarity, which merely allows further centralisation. We want federalism of a democratic nature.

Federalism which links with centralism is like the federalism of the former Soviet Union and Yugoslavia. That was never federalism—it was centralism, because power was subsumed by bureaucratic centralised forces. That is the danger of the treaty. I support new clauses 74 and 75 without any illusions, and I oppose the Bill.

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): At the beginning of the debate, there were marginal differences between the two sides. It gave a bizarre impression. I felt that one could imagine Opposition spokesmen saying, "The gulf between us and the Government on this subject is huge. We believe that the social protocol has a circumference of $30\frac{1}{8}$ cm and the Government believe that it has a circumference of $30\frac{1}{32}$ cm. That is a huge and unbridgeable gulf. We believe that the Government are wrong."

Mr. Duncan-Smith: How many centimetres does my hon. Friend say it is?

Mr. Dykes: I should not like to suggest how many. It might be shrinking or expanding.

The debate has been bizarre. The divisions between hon. Members have widened with the more recent speeches. I certainly do not agree with the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin) in his lengthy speech—I think that he spoke for 25 minutes or more.

I sense that hon. Members, including those who have not taken part in the debate, would like it to conclude fairly speedily. For that and for other respectable reasons, my remarks will be brief. I do not challenge the Chair's judgment on the length of the debate, Mr. Lofthouse. It is a matter for the Chair. But I imagine that it might be the overwhelming feeling of hon. Members that the debate should conclude.

I am perhaps more enthusiastic about the development of the European Community than some of my colleagues. I use the word "some" deliberately. I certainly do not include among them my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, who has done excellent work. I know that he is justifiably keen on the developments in Europe, because they enhance the national interest and the intrinsic national sovereignty of the United Kingdom working with our partners.

Inevitably, in the debate on new clauses 74 and 75 during the last days of the Committee on the Floor of the House, we are taken up with our preoccupations in this ancient and important House of Commons. But we seem to have the impression that we are in a vacuum, and that the other member states of the European Community are of no consequence.

We should remember that 10 member states have ratified the treaty. The exceptions include the eccentric actions which have taken place in the federal supreme court in Karlsruhe. I believe that they will shortly be determined. The judges may be presiding over them at this moment. With that exception—I cannot think of any other—10 member states have ratified the Maastricht treaty in respect of all their constitutional requirements. They are waiting with mounting impatience for the eccentric hesitations of the United Kingdom and the even more eccentric hesitations of the Danes to catch up with that reality and that process.

Britain's process of ratification will now be further extended as a result of new clause 74, and to a lesser extent new clause 75. I regret that. I assume, optimistically, that the votes on the resolutions that will be presented to the House under new clauses 74 and 75 will take place fairly quickly. Perhaps the Minister of State will clarify that today or on a later occasion. Some hon. Members have suggested that they will take place before Royal Assent and others have suggested that it will be after Royal Assent. That is a matter for abstruse argument—perhaps it does not matter—but I hope that the motions will be introduced soon.

I assume that the Bill will take a minimum of six or seven weeks in the House of Lords, and that those who intend to rebel against the treaty and the legislation will be ground into the dust by the natural majority in the House of Lords in favour of the treaty. I look forward to that process. Some distinguished and eminent Members of the upper House will be involved. I am sure that they will be crushingly defeated during that six or seven-week process. That will bring us—without anticipating the progress of the Bill in this place and incurring your displeasure, Mr. Lofthouse—to the third week of July. That will be enough.

I believe that, on 18 May, there will be a positive yes result in Denmark. I was telephoned by a journalist who is a famous and distinguished member of the Lobby—deliberately, therefore, I will not mention his name—from Copenhagen and by another journalist who is also there. They told me that there are positive signs that there will be a powerful yes vote. They had tried to put articles in their respective newspapers, but the editors were not keen on taking them. That is the black press of the United Kingdom newspaper industry. It is not keen on giving good news about the European Community.

In his amusing account of "Dancing with Dogma", Lord Gilmour, a distinguished former colleague in the House, gave essential good advice. He said that Baroness Thatcher wanted everyone to cease to be citizens of the United Kingdom and become consumers. I remember visiting in Brussels Madam Papandreou, who causes a great deal of excitement, anxiety and bitterness among some of my Tory colleagues because of her reputation as a social reformer. She said that Mrs. Thatcher wanted to make the whole Community into one big supermarket. I suppose that that was the essential approach of the previous Conservative Government, at least in respect of its leadership.

That is no longer the case. We now have a balanced Conservative Administration running pragmatic policies from the centre. Although we shall not be present for it, I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's speech on Europe at the meeting of the Conservative group for Europe at one of the leading west end hotels tonight will be enthusiastic.

8.30 pm

I cannot understand all the excitement about these matters. I cannot see any differences on social policy between the provisions in the Maastricht treaty and the provisions in the Single European Act. I suppose that the provisions in the treaty are softer in tone and refer more to commencement reflecting unanimity rather than majority voting; otherwise, they seem exactly the same. It is almost as if the Maastricht treaty had been written by the same officials on the basis of the Single European Act. I would not trespass on the patience of the House by reading them all out, but they are similar.

I am fascinated by the reference to article 118B in the Single European Act which says:

"The Commission shall endeavour to develop the dialogue between management and labour at European level which could, if the two sides consider it desirable, lead to relations based on agreement."

By the way, the French text and the German text refer to legal agreement. There may have been nifty footwork, or whatever the equivalent is with the pen, by British officials when they ensured that "legal" was left out. I am only guessing that; I am not sure that it is so. Some people might say that the reverse was true, because the others wanted to include the word "legal". I doubt that. However, it shows that the United Kingdom has already signed up to the concept of the social protocol.

Ms Joyce Quin (Gateshead, East): Given that the hon. Gentleman says that there is not much difference between earlier commitments on social policy and the commitments in the social chapter of the Maastricht treaty, is he saying that he does not agree with his Government's opt-out in the treaty, and that he will therefore vote with us in trying to ensure that Britain becomes part of the social chapter?

Mr. Dykes: Because the relevant motions in due course will be merely expressions of opinion and nothing more, we will have to judge them when the time comes. I suppose I would be one Conservative Member who would be less intensively opposed to our inclusion in the social chapter. Because I recognise that this country has had recessionary problems which are more severe than those of some other member states—including France, despite what has been said by other hon. Members—I want to give the Government the benefit of the doubt when they say that it would be wrong for us to be included in the social protocol at this stage.

As the Conservative party returns to a tradition of pragmatism and moderation, and gets away from the narrow and mean-minded attitude of keeping the workers in their place, a future Conservative Government will probably have more self-confidence in respect of acceding to the then developing social protocol. I do not believe that there will be anything to worry about, but the United Kingdom economy should perhaps be stronger before we accept that position. No one can say with certainty how matters will develop.

It is farcical to say that there is anything terrifying in these matters intrinsically, because no specific proposals have yet been made by the 11. They will use the machinery of the Community and the Commission to produce proposals. When they roll off the production line, I think that they will be few in number, because the other member states are beset as well by recessionary anxieties, and they will be mild in character. It will be left to member states to decide the framework. Indeed, that is laid down in the relevant parts of the Single European Act and the Maastricht treaty. Therefore, I have no great terror about them, but I understand the Government's hesitation.

People have said, with justification, that the Government acted as they did because they felt obliged to keep their own supporters in place. Bearing in mind what has happened during the prolonged Committee stage, that calculation may not have turned out to be accurate. Be that as it may, it was a legitimate political calculation for any Government to make, even if the so-called supporters who were being wooed were rather ungrateful, cavalier and churlish about it, and did not respond to the effort at appeasement. We will see later how matters work out. In the meantime, I am happy to support the Government enthusiastically in their suggestions about new clauses 74 and 75.

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury): I confess that I am slightly disappointed that the Government have chosen to accept new clauses 74 and 75. It would have been helpful to have a vote and to put the debate on the social chapter behind us. Unlike my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes), I have no compunction about opposing the notion of the social chapter. I understand the honest advocacy of it by Opposition Members. It seeks to move Europe, including this country, in the direction of economic and social policy which is in line with their honestly expressed political philosophy. I cannot blame them for that aspiration.

This is a debate in which there are cannons to the right as well as to the left. I want to spend some time addressing the arguments of some of my hon. Friends, expressed most cogently and strongly by my hon. Friend the Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin) in his speech and by my hon. Friend the Member for Chingford (Mr. Duncan-Smith) in interventions in this debate and in previous Committee sittings.

Their objection seems to fall into two parts. They argue basically that the social chapter is obnoxious and that it runs counter to Conservative principle and policy, but that nevertheless the Government's opt-out is meaningless. I think that they have two reasons for saying that. I shall try to present the argument at its strongest and not to misrepresent it. The first strand of their argument is that the opt-out does not matter because any regulation which was important could be forced through the institutions of the Community and imposed on this country by qualified majority vote under article 118A of the existing treaty concerning health and safety or article 100A concerning the single market. Certainly Commissioners, notably the unlamented Mrs. Papandreou, have sought to stretch the meaning of the Single European Act in recent years beyond what had been anticipated by politicians or lawyers in this country when it was negotiated.

Against that assessment by my hon. Friends, one has to consider the view of fellow members of the Community on the British opt-out from the social chapter. One has to ask oneself why the 11 other member states thought it necessary to have the social protocol attached to the treaty, and why they believed that it was not enough to rest on the provisions already included in the Single European Act. Presumably they felt that their ambitions for a grander European economic and social strategy could not be realised under the existing treaty.

Mr. Delors' talk of the United Kingdom becoming a paradise for inward investment has often been quoted. There are other examples. There were reports that the German Social Democratic party and the German Trade Union Federation were considering action to question the legality of the British opt-out because they were afraid of its effect on German competitiveness. The Portuguese Secretary of State for European Integration, Mr. Vitor Martins, said last year that the social protocol put the 11 other members of the European Community at a disadvantage compared with the United Kingdom. In recent months we have heard dark mutterings from French politicians about the relocation of jobs from France to the United Kingdom by Hoover and other firms. Whatever the reasons for those decisions, French politicians have questioned our opt-out and argued that it presents economic dangers to France.

There will be those in the Community, notably in the Commission, who will seek to stretch the rules. We have seen that in the past and no doubt we shall see it in the future. My hon. Friends the Members for Colchester, North and for Chingford, however, underestimate the legal grounds that are available, in the last resort, to the British Government and the practicalities of current political trends within the Community.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): I should not like my hon. Friend to be under any misapprehension. During the passage of the Single European Act some of us did draw attention to the fact that what he described as stretching might occur. We did not see it as stretching—we saw it as an inevitable process,and we believe that the same will happen under the Bill.

Mr. Lidington: I know that my hon. Friend and other senior Members of the House have been consistent in their opposition to EC legislation for many years.

The legal case which would be available to the British Government, should they choose to take it, could rest on the words of article 118A, which limits qualified majority voting to directives brought forward on the grounds of health and safety. They could also refer to the restricted wording of article 100A, which refers to the internal market—a definition made tighter by the wording of the Maastricht treaty. Article 3 describes the internal market as one "characterized by the abolition, as between Member States, of obstacles to the free movement of goods, persons, services and capital".

The concept of the internal market is therefore separated within the treaty from the objectives of the union towards strengthening economic and social cohesion, as listed in article 3(j) and the objective of contributing to a high level of health protection, listed under article 3(o).

We must also take into account, as my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East acknowledged, the political and practical arguments now at play. We should consider the considerable successes of my right hon. Friends in moderating some of the proposals from the Commission so that they are at worst unobjectionable, and at best often desirable from our point of view. Faced with the pressures of recession and the threat of severe competition from the developing economies of the Pacific rim, other European countries have begun to question whether new regulations are needed. At the last ECOFIN meeting we were treated to the spectacle of the Spanish and German Ministers saying that there was no longer any need for extra regulations and, indeed, that the reverse was true.

The second argument advanced by my hon. Friends the Members for Colchester, North and for Chingford related to incremental revision by the European Court of Justice. They argued that because the court can look to article 2 of the treaty, which sets out the aim of strengthening economic and social cohesion, the court will use that, case by case, to undermine the exemptions given to us by the social protocol.

Article 4 of the treaty says:

"Each institution"—

including, of course, the court—

"shall act within the limits of the powers conferred upon it by this Treaty."

We must also consider what the protocols mean. I have not read all the detailed papers, so I shall not enter into the argument between my hon. Friend the Member for Colchester, North and my right hon. Friend the Minister about recent individual cases heard by the European Court of Justice, but I believe that there is a substantial difference between the court ruling on the meaning of directives approved by the member states, through the institutions of the Community, and the court seeking to overturn, in whatever manner, a protocol which has equal status with the main text of the treaty.

Mr. Duncan-Smith: I am glad that my hon. Friend has quoted my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East, who has already categorised him and me as mean-spirited people for finding great fault with the concept of the social chapter.

The nub of my argument, which I believe that my hon. Friend has slightly missed, is that the problem lies in the protocol, which states:

"without prejudice to the provisions of this Treaty, particularly those relating to social policy which constitute an integral part of the 'acquis communautaire'".

The court does not set out to reverse anything by itself that would be done as a result of what is brought before it by a variety of challenges. It is a fact that that protocol cannot be invoked by us to reject the fact that we shall be bound into certain social provisions—I say certain, not all—because the court will not take the protocol or the chapter into consideration because it is obscured by the protocol. That is the danger. The protocol is the threat; it is kept around the treaty when it should be banished.

8.45 pm

Mr. Lidington: The battle over the interpretation of "acquis communautaire" embodied in article 118 and in others will continue and both the political and the legal arguments will come into play. The crucial point about the protocol is that it is explicit and lays down with the authority of a treaty that the United Kingdom is excluded from measures brought forward by the other 11 member states within the context of that protocol.

Mr. Jenkin: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Lidington: I apologise to my hon. Friend, but I must draw my remarks to a conclusion.

I shall be with my hon. Friends the Members for Chingford and for Colchester, North in arguing, as we approach 1996, that we should seek further treaty revisions, further protocols, which define, limit and make more precise the remit of Community institutions as opposed to those of individual national Governments and Parliaments. As to the debate on which we are embarked now, the decision of all Conservatives to reject the social chapter accords with political principle and with our national interest.

Ms Joyce Quin (Gateshead, East): We have had an interesting debate on the procedure and the substance of the social chapter.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) explained clearly the Opposition's view on the procedure that we are adopting and I support what he said. I also support what he said about the continuing importance to us of amendment No. 27. I share his hope and that of other hon. Friends that that amendment will be dealt with on Report.

We also attach considerable importance to new clause 74 because it is an effective way in which to ensure, before the Act comes into force, that the Committee can express its view on the social protocol and the social opt out that the Government negotiated at Maastricht. It would be outrageous if the Committee did not have an appropriate opportunity to vote on the desirability or otherwise of the United Kingdom's incorporating the social chapter in its version of the Maastricht treaty. There is no doubt that the exclusion of Britain from the social chapter is by far the most important way in which the deal on offer to the British people differs from that on offer to all the other people of the European Community. It is, therefore, one of the most important aspects of our considerations of the Maastricht treaty.

The Foreign Secretary did not say a great deal about procedure and I got the impression that he was not terribly keen to speak at length on the procedural issues involved, despite the fact that some of his hon. Friends tried to embroil him in precisely such a discussion. In answer to one of my hon. Friends, he said that the Government would simply have to reflect on the position depending on what happened when the Bill had completed all its stages and we were faced with a motion on the social chapter.

I hope that the Government will reflect on this matter. I do not know whether the Minister is planning to give us any more information on procedural matters, but Members on both sides of the Committee would welcome further information from the Government about their thoughts.

I am glad that the Government have accepted new clause 74, although I agree with my hon. Friends that the Government probably had no alternative, because they would have been defeated. There is no doubt, however, that the Foreign Secretary skated over the implications of a defeat on whatever motion is eventually put before us on the social chapter and our adhesion to it. I should welcome from the Government a clear commitment not to oppose the will of the House if hon. Members vote against the Government's view on the social chapter.

An aspect that will be of interest, although it has not been clarified in today's debate, is the likely attitude of the nationalist parties towards whatever motion is tabled on the social chapter. We in the official Opposition have often referred to what we regard as the shabby deal that was done between the nationalist parties and the Government over the question of the Committee of the Regions. That shabby agreement seems to have resulted in the nationalists supporting the Government on all sorts of procedural votes since. I do not know whether the nationalists also plan to support the Government in whatever motion is tabled on the social chapter. I hope that they will not, because it would result in a bad deal for the people of the constituencies they represent and for Britain as a whole.

Like many hon. Members who have spoken in the debate, I am not a lawyer. I am not even a jobbing lawyer, a phrase which calls to mind an exchange between the Minister of State and the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen). So I was glad that, although the Foreign Secretary disappointed us by not saying enough about procedure, he at least referred at some length to the substance of the social chapter. Again, I got the impression that the right hon. Gentleman was more interested in convincing his hon. Friends of the merits of what he was saying than anything else. He was certainly anxious to get the support of the Euro-sceptics on the Benches behind him for whatever motion is finally put before us.

I do not think the Foreign Secretary convinced many of his hon. Friends. He might have convinced the hon. Members for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Clifton-Brown) and for Stamford and Spalding (Mr. Davies), who both supported the right hon. Gentleman's position. But the Foreign Secretary was a long way from satisfying other of his hon. Friends, including the hon. Members for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor), who spoke in interventions, for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin) and for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington), who did not appear to take quite the same Euro-sceptic line as some of his hon. Friends.

As we listened to contributions to the debate by Conservative Members, we heard two different views emerge. On the one hand, the Government view of the social chapter was that it was dreadful, that it had to be resisted and that the only way to resist it was via the opt-out of the Maastricht treaty. On the other hand, we heard the strong view that the opt-out was a waste of time because the social measures could be enforced via existing treaties and treaty obligations.

Mr. Jenkin: I must correct the hon. Lady. I do not think any of my hon. Friends have said that the opt-out is a waste of time. We are simply seeking to demonstrate that the Government claim that the Maastricht treaty will avoid intrusive legislation, the mandate on which they conducted the Maastricht negotiations—[Interruption.] I stand corrected if I recall the position incorrectly. Our worry is that the lessons of the Single European Act have not been learned and that the Maastricht treaty could make matters worse.

Ms Quin: I am far from convinced. I listened with interest to the hon. Gentleman's speech tonight, having listened to him on a previous occasion, when we were debating amendment No. 27. He then said little in favour of the social opt-out and much about how inevitable the social measures would be, whether or not we had an opt-out. That message came across clearly from several of his hon. Friends, so I cannot regard his most recent comments as persuasive.

Euro-sceptics on the Government Benches say that the opt-out will not have much effect. Meanwhile, supporters of the Government line say that the opt-out is necessary, and they congratulate the Government on having achieved it. But the hon. Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) was the exception. While he has supported the Government strongly in their European policies, he conceded that there is already a commitment to the social dimension under existing treaties, perhaps making the opt-out less effective than the Government claim. [Interruption.] I gather from the demeanour of the hon. Member for Colchester, North that his hon. Friend was agreeing with some of his comments. Even so, the hon. Member for Harrow, East dealt with the matter from an entirely different perspective, and he is troubled by the fact that the Government's social opt-out is putting Britain at a distance from its European social partners in an important area of policy. That is also worrying the former

[Ms Quin]

Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath), who has spoken in favour of the social chapter and has cast doubts on the Government achieving the opt-out.

The Foreign Secretary tried to make a strong case against the social chapter. That case was not convincing, not just to many of his hon. Friends but to all who spoke from the Opposition Benches. The right hon. Gentleman again claimed that the social chapter would be a huge burden on business, yet he produced little evidence to support that claim.

His hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Fabricant) tried to make a helpful intervention by referring to Nissan, even though he must have overlooked the views of that company's managing director, given recently to the Select Committee on Employment, when he said clearly that the social chapter was in no way a problem for Nissan and that the company, operating in Sunderland, already complied with the various requirements of the social chapter and the social charter and saw no difficulty in Britain being a fully paid-up member of the social chapter. That view must be made loud and clear.

Government supporters referred at length to the question of inward investment and agreed with comments reported to have been made by Jacques Delors about the United Kingdom being a paradise for inward investors if it did not have the various attributes of the social charter and the social chapter. On that issue, I do not agree with Jacques Delors, and recent evidence shows that inward investors would not be deterred by the United Kingdom's being part of the social chapter. I refer hon. Members to an interesting recent publication from the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, "Financial Market Trends".

Mr. Duncan-Smith: The hon. Lady said that inward investors would not be deterred if we were to participate in the social chapter. That is not the key question, which is whether they would be encouraged by this country being exempted from the social chapter.

Ms Quin: My own contacts with Nissan have provided me with no evidence to suppose that that is so. The publication that has recently been produced by the OECD studies trends of direct inward investment in different European Community countries in the past two or three years. It contains the following sentence, which seems a surprising one, given the claim of Conservative Members during today's debate and on earlier occasions:

"On the recipients side, France was the notable exception to the general slowdown registered among OECD Member countries. Inflows to France grew faster than outflows, and for the first time foreign direct investment in France is larger than French investment abroad".

In 1992, our Government were constantly criticising the French Government for their attachment to European social issues and their commitment to the European social chapter. The facts as outlined by the OECD seem to prove the exact opposite of what Conservative Members have been trying to prove in the debate. That point must be made loud and clear.

The Foreign Secretary was wrong when he talked about the costs of employee protection. He seemed to fail to see any advantages in employee protection. He claimed that it destroys jobs, but that does not fit in with what happened in Britain in the 1980s, when unemployment rose dramatically precisely when the Government were weakening various aspects of employee protection. The fact that we have lower levels of employee protection does not seem to stop us having the fastest rising unemployment in Europe at present.

9 pm

Mr. Jenkin: If the hon. Lady looks at the employment rates she will draw a different conclusion.

Ms Quin: No, I do not think that I shall. I have looked at the figures and it is clear that over the past couple of years unemployment in the United Kingdom has risen faster than it has in any other European country. Another hon. Member referred to the welcome drop in unemployment today, but that does not alter the figures for the past two years, however much Conservative Members might wish that it did.

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring): As the hon. Lady specifically mentioned France, will she say why Hoover decided to relocate in Scotland, not France? I believe that it is the first of many companies that will do so if we stay out of the social chapter and France remains party to it.

Ms Quin: I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman was present for the Foreign Secretary's speech, but the Foreign Secretary rightly said that the movement of jobs was a two-way process. He acknowledged that it was not a simple trend that could be explained by a simple reason. Certainly, although there was not nearly as much publicity about it, there was a transfer of jobs by Nestlé from this country to Dijon shortly after the transfer of Hoover jobs from Dijon to Cambuslang. We must take account of all the factors, not isolate and oversimplify a complex matter.

Many of us feel that one of the main aspects that help a company to decide where to invest is the availability of skilled labour. We must also bear that factor in mind when considering inward investment flows. I am keen for inward investment to continue and I hope that we shall have the right conditions for inward investment in future. If one listens to Nissan and looks at the records of other Japanese countries that have invested in this country, one sees that they all have better social protection than is envisaged in the social charter. That reason blows an enormous hole in the arguments advanced by the Government.

Some hon. Members have today rightly referred to the untenable position of British multinational companies which will operate in the single European market and will be affected by the other 11 countries' social policies. That will make it difficult for this country to stand aside. I cannot believe that it will be feasible for British firms that employ people in a great many other European countries to operate an entirely different system in the United Kingdom from that which they operate in the other 11 countries.

I am glad that the Foreign Secretary said that a social dimension was important in Europe. However, I am sorry that he went on to say that it was important only in a general way, and that it was not important to back it up with specific commitments and regulations. I felt that perhaps the Foreign Secretary has been dealing with foreign affairs for too long, as he seemed to be out of touch with some of the working conditions in Britain today.

I was glad that that point was made not only by my hon. Friends, but by the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) when he spoke about conditions in the security industry. That is something that I can back up from my own experience in my constituency, where not long ago, for example, a job for a security guard was advertised at £1·85 an hour for a 70-hour week—working a great many hours in a difficult and dangerous job.

That kind of statistic shows that there is, unfortunately, exploitation in Britain today. I believe that that exploitation is particularly strong in areas where unemployment is so high that people will go to almost any lengths, quite understandably, to get jobs. But the fact that unemployment is high is no excuse for appallingly low levels of social protection. That is something which we must also bear in mind.

The problem of poverty in Britain, which is very serious and increased during the 1980s, should make us, above all countries, take the social dimension in Europe very seriously. It is tragic that we are marching in the wrong direction. It is not right that we end up subsidising employers who pay poverty wages. In the example quoted by the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber, it was clear that the only way that people in the security industry can survive is by claiming family credit and income support in various ways. It is not right that good employers should be undercut by bad employers who benefit from these unfair subsidies.

It is a great shame that there was no recognition in the Foreign Secretary's speech or, indeed, in the speeches of other Conservative Members of the fact that high levels of social protection can help companies. I was reminded of that when I read this week a helpful booklet, which I think is produced by the Business in the Community organisation, entitled "Corporate Culture and Caring". In a few interesting case studies it shows that it is sensible for firms to have good maternity benefits and good child care provisions of various kinds to get trained workers back to work, because that costs employers far less than getting rid of people and then being forced to take them on again later. This, too, is an aspect that should be taken very much into account.

It is not good enough for the Foreign Secretary to talk only about unemployment or for the hon. Member for Stamford and Spalding to say that unemployment is the only problem that we face in Britain today. We have to see the twin evils of unemployment on the one hand and very poor wages and working conditions on the other, and if we do not tackle both of them the country will not be in a very happy or healthy position in the future.

I urge Conservative Members to read the recent report from the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux, which depicts very graphically some of the poor working conditions in Britain today.

One of the aspects that the Foreign Secretary mentioned was unfair dismissal. He said that he was worried that under the social chapter such issues might be looked at on the European level. I should be delighted if the European Community looked at this area of policy, because it is clear that in no other European country do part-time workers have to work for five years for the same employer before they get any rights whatsoever with regard to unfair dismissal. That seems to me to be a distortion in the European market that is completely unacceptable.

The Government, as we know, have played a deeply negative role in employment and social affairs matters in the European Community. They have blocked many of the social directives which Labour Members believe are important and would have been welcome additions to the body of European legislation. I refer to such measures as the directive to give employment protection to part-time and temporary workers—a growing part of the British labour force. There is also the directive to give a parental leave entitlement during a child's first three years of life. Many other directives have been similarly treated.

I suppose that, as time has gone on, the Government have become increasingly embarrassed by their isolation in Council meetings of Employment and Labour Ministers, because they have continually had to veto sensible proposals advanced by the other 11 countries. Perhaps because of that, the Government saw the Maastricht social opt-out as a way of ending their embarrassment and isolation. Henceforward, they would not be consulted about or involved in that sort of decision making.

The Government are incorrect, however, to think that they can spare themselves that sort of embarrassment. As my hon. Friends have pointed out, whatever happens, we cannot hope to enjoy some sort of neat isolation on social issues from the rest of the Community. That is just not possible. As the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber said, it will cause a great deal of confusion and administrative difficulty which the Government have not taken into account.

As several Conservative Members have noted, there is also the possibility of the competition rules being invoked at the European Court, and other countries are likely to use certain aspects of European legislation against Britain if they believe that we are deriving an unfair advantage through the social opt-out.

Some Conservative Members have expressed the hope that the principle of subsidiarity will extricate the Government from the difficulties surrounding social policy. I tend to agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, North-East (Mr. Barnes), who described the flexible nature of the definition of subsidiarity—it seems to mean whatever people like it to mean. The Government define it as applying whenever they do not like some European measure. Then, they say, we should decide the matter at home. We do not find that very convincing.

I would not counsel the Government to entertain any hopes that subsidiarity can be invoked to spare them difficulties with social legislation. The conclusions of the Edinburgh Council meeting clearly stated that the social chapter had to be proceeded with and that there was no question of its being dismantled under the heading of subsidiarity. The Government are therefore in danger of being dragged along, all unwilling, on social matters, if they insist on pursuing the social opt-out avenue. It would be far better to be a fully participating member of the European Community and to take part in social affairs decisions than to be dragged through the European Court subsequently, which would serve only to weaken our position in the Community.

There is no doubt that our semi-detached status in Europe detracts inward investors. Ernst and Young have done an interesting study, surveying many of the United Kingdom's leading companies. It shows that the opt-outs agreed by the Government at Maastricht worry businesses and inward investors, who wonder about the scale of the Government's commitment to the EC and whether Britain will be a good base from which to operate if it does not offer proper access to the rest of the large internal market. The Government should take such worries seriously.

[Ms Quin]

If the Government accept our view and opt back into the social chapter, that will ensure an orderly and effective way of dealing with social issues. It will avoid the Government's being embarrassed and dragged unwillingly into decisions. Many hon. Members on both sides have tellingly described how that might come about.

My hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, North-East made a worthwhile point about how the Council of Ministers dealing with social issues work. The problem is secrecy; it is difficult to find out which way Governments voted on some issues. It is irritating for Members of this Parliament or of the European Parliament to be told in answer to questions that we are not allowed to know how Governments have voted, although the next day the answers to our questions are published in the newspapers.

9.15 pm

My right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition and some leaders of our sister parties in the Community and outside it recently held a meeting at which my right hon. and learned Friend met the new Danish Social Democratic Prime Minister whose election we welcomed. Also present were party leaders from Norway, Sweden and Finland and the leader's representative from the Federal Republic of Germany. I welcome the agreement reached between my right hon. and learned Friend and his colleagues. That agreement was a way forward for the Community and a welcome change from the negative attitude that Ministers have adopted throughout our Committee proceedings. The attitude of my right hon. and learned Friend is indicative of the way that Europe should go on social and employment issues.

The communiqué of that meeting showed the importance not only of tackling employment but of a social dimension to safeguard Europe's achievements in social protection. That communiqué was issued on 5 April and stated that all the parties agreed that Europe must be more than just a market for business. It must be a community for people. That is why the social dimension is critical.

My right hon. and learned Friend and his opposite numbers agreed on the importance of unblocking some of the social initiatives that for years have been persistently blocked by the Government in the Council of Ministers. One of those initiatives was mentioned by the hon. Member for Colchester, North, who spoke about the European works council directive. He suggested that the matter would be pursued via the social protocol by the other 11 countries acting on their own. The Government will have to give some kind of view on this issue at the next official meeting of the European Council of Labour and Employment Ministers.

Perhaps the Minister of State will tell us about the attitude that the Government will adopt to those directives at the June meeting of the Council. The right hon. Gentleman seems to be sinking lower in his seat and avoids meeting my eye. I shall repeat my question, because three important directives are to be considered at that meeting. One will be a directive on works councils. Another will be on working time, which is of great interest to many British people who are forced to work long hours. Another confirms the directive on the protection of young people at work. Again, the Government have so far taken a negative view on that.

I should like to hear from the Minister what attitude the Government are to take at the June Council of Labour and Employment Ministers on those three matters. What is not an option at the meeting is simply to postpone the matter. The Danish Prime Minister has said clearly that the Danish presidency wants to get agreement at that meeting on those three important directives as well as on other matters on which the Government might have an idiosyncratic view.

It does not look as though the Minister will enlighten us this evening on the Government's view, so let me make it clear that we shall watch him closely on those matters because we believe that the three directives are very much in the interests of British people at work. It would be outrageous if the Government went along to the Council in June and simply blocked them. The Government might try to block them in the hope that the other 11 member states would simply go on by themselves once the Maastricht treaty is ratified and agree the directives by majority vote. Again, it would be foolish to go down that route as, eventually, other European Governments will complain that the United Kingdom's action distorts competition within the Community and effectively makes the operation of the single European market—all along the Government have said that they are keen on that—difficult to work in practice. We hope that the Government will take a positive view on those issues.

Perhaps the Government would also like to tell us what view they will take at the European summit at Copenhagen on these matters.

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. The hon. Lady is stretching new clause 74 rather extensively.

Ms Quin: I have given the Minister a great deal of food for thought and I am sure that we all look forward to hearing the detailed response that he will make to the points that I have raised.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wallsend (Mr. Byers) said, a few hours ago, that for us the Maastricht treaty and the social charter go together and I entirely concur with that view. My hon. Friends have also said that it would be reprehensible for the Government, if they are defeated and the House agrees to the motion accepting the social chapter, to thwart the will of the House. That message needs to be made clearly. Whatever legal niceties the Government might want to take refuge in, their position would be politically and morally untenable if they decided to ignore the will of the House as expressed in such a motion.

The arrogance of a Government who were prepared to go to such lengths in such a matter would be punished not only by political opinion in the House but by the country as a whole.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

The Chairman: Order. Before I put the final motion, I should like to place on record my thanks for the support that I have had from the two Deputy Chairmen, the hon. Members for Pontefract and Castleford (Mr. Lofthouse) and for Plymouth, Drake (Dame J. Fookes). The Committee has sat for 163 hours, 131 hon. Members have made speeches, and a further 30 have contributed by way of points of order, making a total of 161.

Mr. Garel-Jones: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. At this historic moment, I should like to say a few words on behalf of all members of the Committee. You have just given us some statistics. No doubt the parliamentary "Wisden" experts will, in the coming weeks, let us know whether we have broken any records.

There are two things which I am sure that the whole Committee would like me to say. First, when we come into this House, none of us knows what fate holds in store for us. You, Mr. Morris, have achieved the position of Chairman of Ways and Means. I dare say that from time to time a number of your constituents ask themselves exactly what contribution it is that you make to the House of Commons since you are unable—as are all other hon. Members, because of their position either as Front Bench spokesmen or as Back Benchers—to make the kind of contribution that your constituents often expect you to make. I am sure that the whole Committee supports me when I say that your constituents should be under no illusions whatever, for you are making, and have made, a very distinguished contribution to the House of Commons by the way in which you have conducted yourself and by the way in which you have looked after all of us throughout this Committee stage. I am sure that all hon. Members will also wish to join me in thanking Mr. Lofthouse and Dame Janet for the way they looked after us when they occupied the Chair.

Secondly, you have alluded, Mr. Morris, to the number of right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the Committee who have contributed to the debates. The hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) is, according to some right hon. and hon. Members, in collusion with me. I see him nodding gravely. Alas, the collusion that I should like to see between the Treasury Bench and the Opposition Front Bench has not taken place quite so fully as I should have liked. Nevertheless, I know that the Committee will wish me to say that the hon. Member for Hamilton has been a regular and distinguished attender of these proceedings.

As for the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston), his position on this Bill and on the European Community is different from that of the Treasury Bench and the Opposition Front Bench and, certainly, from that of the other friendly alliances that have existed across the Committee. The hon. Gentleman's party and he himself have held a consistent and honourable view on Britain's position in the European Community, though it is not one that I share.

And so we conclude our consideration of the Bill. Time will tell whether we have broken any records. I have been asking myself what this Bill will be called when, as I believe it shortly will, it becomes an Act. I am told by my officials that its official name will be the European Communities (Amendment) Act 1993. I very much hope that its date will be 1993. I am also told by my officials that, although that will be the official name of the Act and how it should be cited legally, hon. Members are perfectly entitled to call it anything they like. After the number of hours that we have put in, I dare say that hon. Members will have a number of ways of describing the Act and I would not wish to speculate on them.

As the Minister of State in charge of the Bill, may I say —I know that my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary joins me in this—to all members of the Committee how much I, too, have appreciated the friendly and courteous way in which we have handled the proceedings. If I could introduce a harmonisation measure through the Commission, I should like, without presumption, to introduce one which enabled other Parliaments of the Community to scrutinise European Community legislation in a way which incorporated the interest that hon. Members in all parts of the Committee have taken in the proceedings on this Bill. If there could be more of that spirit throughout the Community, it would be a much better place. Thank you very much, Mr. Morris, on behalf of us all.

Mr. George Robertson: Further to that point of order, Mr. Morris. I crave your indulgence in adding a few words to those of the Minister of State in charge of the Bill. I believe that all Opposition parties agree very much with what he said. We are grateful for the understanding and patience that you and your deputies have shown during the 163 hours of debate. If 161 Members have spoken for 163 hours, the average time must be rather peculiar, given that some Members have taken slightly more than the average. Nevertheless, that is a formidable record for those who have had to sit through all that time, those who have had to chair the Committee, stay awake, stay at attention and keep it in order. We are duly grateful for that.

9.30 pm

I also endorse what the Minister of State said, although perhaps I should be very wary of endorsing too much of what he says lest people begin to talk, although I suppose that speaking in the Committee stage of the European Communities (Amendment) Bill is as close to speaking off the record as one can get in Parliament. The Minister is right to say that there has been a friendly atmosphere on what is still a controversial Bill, with a number of hurdles still to come. Throughout the Committee stage there has been an element of frankness, of friendliness and of courtesy, to which we should pay tribute.

It is only right to explain at this stage why my hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead, East (Ms Quin) was coming in for some nervous criticism towards the end of her speech. That was entirely my fault, because I had asked her if she would keep speaking until I told her to stop, so that I could complete a task which had to be finished before the end of our proceedings. I then handed her a note of the time for which she has already spoken—28 minutes. My hon. Friend believed that I was asking her to speak for a further 28 minutes and, displaying great skill, while continuing to speak she pencilled the words "No way" at the bottom of my note. So loyal is my hon. Friend, however, that she kept on speaking until the message eventually got through. I take all the blame for that, and no criticism should be attached to my hon. Friend.

Having sat through the Committee stage of the Single European Act as well as the Committee stage of this Bill, I am reminded of one of my favourite quotations from Oscar Wilde:

> "I have never much admired the courage of the lion tamer; after all, inside his cage he is at least safe from other men".

I congratulate you, Mr. Morris, and offer you and your deputies our thanks. I am sure that when you are outside the cage, come next Monday, you will look on the Committee proceedings on the Bill with nostalgia but, I dare say, with little regret.

Bill reported, with amendments; as amended, to be considered tomorrow.

Import Substitution

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Arbuthnot.]

9.33 pm

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): I am most grateful to Madam Speaker for allowing me this important debate in which to raise my deep concern about the erosion of our manufacturing base and the United Kingdom's severe imbalance in trade in manufactured goods. I believe that those two problems can be tackled effectively by my proposals for import substitution. I am delighted to see my right hon. Friend the Minister for Industry in his place, and I consider it a great honour that he has decided to answer this Adjournment debate.

As the House knows, with a number of my parliamentary colleagues I have recently launched the Manufacturing and Construction Industries Alliance, which has received messages of support from the Leader of the Opposition, from the leader of the Liberal Democrat party and, of course, from my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. My right hon. Friend sent the following message to the alliance on the occasion of its launch:

"I am sure the Alliance will argue the case for manufacturing industry with vigour in the years ahead. I look forward to its dialogue with Government in this important cause."

It is clear that the Prime Minister is aware of the importance of our manufacturing and construction industries to our economic recovery. I believe that he shares my view that manufacturing industry is the only real source of non-inflationary economic growth, and that we neglect it at our peril. I believe, Mr. Morris—I am sorry, Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am so used to seeing you in your guise as Chairman of Ways and Means, presiding with distinction over the Committee stage of the European Communities Bill, that I inadvertently called you by the wrong name. Anyway, I believe that the Prime Minister may see what he can do to reverse the decline in that sector of our economy in the years to come.

I must stress that, in this debate—which I consider to be part of that dialogue—I do not use the term "import substitution" in any protectionist sense. I am far from isolationist; I want more trade, not less. May I refer again to the debate that preceded this one? My horizon is well beyond the boundaries of the European Community—even the expanded boundaries of that Community. I believe that we need to look to North America and, increasingly, to the Pacific rim, where the fastest economic growth in the world is taking place. Many countries in that area are well disposed towards the United Kingdom and keen to buy its products, and my right hon. Friend's Department is already giving much more emphasis to those countries.

None the less, the position is dire. During the 1980s, the manufacturing sector lost 2 million jobs, which is probably costing the country—the taxpayer and the Exchequer—£18 billion. That is a major part of the deficit of which we currently hear so much. Between 1990 and 1992, manufacturing output dropped by a further 6·5 per cent.; between 1971 and 1991, the manufacturing share of gross domestic product shrank by more than 10 per cent., while —as the House knows only too well—our trade balance has fallen dramatically into severe deficit.

The need for action to stop the decline was rightly identified recently by the Engineering Employers Federation in its industrial strategy document, which called for a twin-track approach to economic growth, first through immediate action to rectify the balance of payments deficit and secondly by continuing long-term development of technology, skills and industry.

In the short term, there is an immediate need for increased competitive capacity for exports, and for import substitution. New capacity can be installed either by established United Kingdom companies, or by inward investors in activities in which buildings and equipment can readily be obtained, and staff can be recruited and trained quickly. Such opportunities will continue to be internationally mobile as companies seek the greatest productivity for the lowest cost. I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Minister agrees with that.

In the short term, therefore, the exchange rate must be at a level that is competitive for internationally mobile activity. Government must increase support for our exports. Permanently improved capital allowances would be a major stimulant to investment. That view is widely shared in industry, particularly by the Engineering Employers Federation.

That aim can be achieved by increasing the after—tax rate of return and by improving the availability of funds for investment. At the same time, transport and communications infrastructure investment will be required. That is why, in its pre-Budget representations, the alliance called specifically for the introduction of 100 per cent. capital allowances, a commitment to lower interest rates and a competitive sterling, greater support for exporters and greater public investment in partnership with the private sector in infrastructure development.

The House—and I personally—welcome the additional help that the Department of Trade and Industry has given to our exporters through larger sums being available to the Export Credits Guarantee Department and by more competitive premiums. However, as my right hon. Friend is aware, those premiums are not as yet as competitive as Hermes and Kopas, which are two of our major competitors.

In the longer term, competition only on cost would leave British manufacturers increasingly competing against developing countries rather than advanced economies. Our products would be competitive only by selling at an ever lower price and at lower prices. We would therefore become unable to support our advanced-country living standards. No doubt my right hon. Friend is aware of that.

In order to create the climate for import substitution, we must therefore continue to invest heavily in research, product development, education, training and equipment procurement. It might help the House if I were to put the principles that I have articulated into the context of just one industrial sector with which, as some hon. Members will be aware, I am familiar: the clothing and textile industry.

The clothing and textile industry has an annual turnover of £15 billion. It has exports of £4·8 billion annually, and it still employs, despite the dramatic reduction in employment, 400,000 people. However, as we all know, it faces intense import competition. In 1992, imports reached £8·6 billion—up 7 per cent. The trade deficit in textiles and clothing was almost one third of the total national deficit. We are talking about very large sums.

It is glaringly obvious to me that we need to reduce the percentage of our markets that are supplied by imported goods, not—I repeat strongly—by erecting protectionist barriers to trade, but by a three-pronged approach. That approach is, first, to ensure that foreign producers do not receive hidden subsidies and that products are not dumped in this country at unrealistic prices. As we all know, free trade must be fair trade.

Secondly, it should be to identify the areas in which imported goods could effectively and realistically be produced in this country and to ensure that relevant manufacturers and sectors of our economy are made aware of those opportunities.

Thirdly, public and private sector purchasers should be aware of the range of products available from domestic producers and be reminded of the real, but hidden, costs that are involved in purchasing overseas, not only in respect of our balance of trade, but in relation to the jobs that are lost and the loss to the Exchequer in tax from individuals and in corporate taxation from the companies or firms in question. That is a very important matter.

The level of sterling makes import substitution and increased exports more feasible. As my right hon. Friend is aware, industry is making strenuous efforts to rise to the challenges and opportunities that are currently presenting themselves. Further improvements are being made in production. For example, the Apparel, Knitting and Textile Alliance estimates that the volume of output per head in the industries that it represents grew by more than 6 per cent. in 1992. That is a commendable achievement at a time of deep recession. Response times to the requirements of consumers, especially those to major customers, are being reduced. That is good for those who want to buy goods in the United Kingdom. Goods are more readily available and the response times to the requirements of customers are more quickly realised by those who can produce the goods so required.

Standards of quality, design and innovation are continually being improved. The manufacturing industry is working more closely with schools and colleges to improve the skills of the work force. In the clothing sector, the trade associations are ensuring the continuation of the manufacturer-retailer panels—which were previously, as my right hon. Friend is aware, under the wing of the National Economic Development Office—with a remit for promoting consideration of import substitution. Trade associations have established databases of United Kingdom manufacturers in the textile and clothing sector and the engineering sector. They are able to put together customers directly in touch with suitable purchases.

The background to the current position is an erosion of our manufacturing base and a worrying balance of trade deficit yet at the same time a window of opportunity. Recently, the response of the Department of Trade and Industry has been as drab, dreary and unimaginative as only a Government Department can, sadly, too often be. I do not criticise my right hon. Friend at the Dispatch Box, because I know that he shares in many ways my concern about the state of our industries. Those industries are, of course, his responsibility.

My right hon. Friend has read the confidential advice to Ministers on the parlous state of our industry, and I know that he is aware of the window of opportunity that now exists, but I fear that his Department has often missed the point. When I tabled a written question inviting the Minister to respond to the need for import substitution, this was the precise response given by the Minister for Industry:

[Mr. Nicholas Winterton]

"Government activities which seek to discriminate in favour of United Kingdom producers against exporters from other Community member states are precluded by the treaty of Rome."—[Official Report, 17 March 1993; Vol. 221, c. 314.]

Can hon. Members imagine a more unhelpful and negative response? I was dumbstruck by that reply because my question had not called for protectionist measures in any way but the establishment of a new task force on import substitution. If industry in the United Kingdom is represented by people in the Department who respond to a constructive and positive question in that way, God help the future of our industry. They will need God to protect, help and advise them, because, on that sort of record, the Department certainly will not. I put this rhetorical question: would the Government of any other country, whether or not it was a member of the European Community, have responded to the question in that way? I am sure that the answer would be a deafening no.

In the absence as yet of any constructive suggestions from the Department of Trade and Industry, let me set out again those areas in which the United Kingdom and its economy and industries have the right not simply to expect but to demand action from the Conservative Government. The Government must maintain competitive interest rates and exchange rates. We are doing our best to do that, and I commend the Government on their action. They must fight for a level playing field in international trade both within the Community and globally.

On that matter, they leave a great deal to be desired. Actions to deal with unfair competition should be much more speedy than they are. Too often, if we complain about the uneven playing field and dumping, by the time the procedure has been cranked and geared into action, the damage is done—the industries have been knocked out of business and jobs have been lost. As my right hon. Friend the Minister knows, it is difficult to resurrect industry, although that is the objective of import substitution.

As I have already said, it would be a major incentive and stimulant to industry to introduce 100 per cent. capital allowances, even if there were some restrictions on eligibility or the allowances were geared specifically to areas of industrial activity which showed immense potential for import substitution.

The Government should continue to invest in our transport and communications infrastructure. I pay tribute to the Government for their somewhat hesitant steps towards the introduction of private capital into infrastructure expenditure. I should like to see that take place on a much wider basis. The better our infrastructure, the better the opportunities for import substitution and the more efficient and effective our industry will be.

The Government should strive to remove unnecessary burdens on business. Again, I am prepared to pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the Minister and his Department, and in particular to my hon. Friend and constituency neighbour the Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton), who has responsibility for corporate affairs. The Government must ensure that young people leaving our schools, colleges and universities have the skills which are essential if Britain is to remain competitive in world markets. The Government must ensure that existing workers have opportunities to reskill and retrain as new production techniques and new designs are developed. That is absolutely critical. It costs money, and the Government must realise that.

Recently, industry has operated mainly on very low profit margins indeed. It does not have the scope within its resources to provide opportunities for training and reskilling of its workers. The Government must establish in partnership with industry a new task force on import substitution. Perhaps my right hon. Friend the Minister will say that that is my main recommendation. Such a task force could identify areas which offer potential for such substitution.

The task force should ensure that public sector purchasers treat British goods on equal terms with imported goods in terms of quality standards and environmental acceptability of production techniques. That is important. It could ensure that adequate statistics continue to be collected, collated and published, so that a detailed picture of import patterns can be produced to identify areas which offer potential for import substitutions.

The task force could ensure that areas which offer such potential are drawn immediately to the attention of suitable manufacturers. It could ensure that all potential customers, whether large or small, were reminded of the true cost of buying imported goods. The true cost includes the loss of individual taxation and corporate taxation. I did not mention earlier that, if people are not employed, they have to receive some form of state benefit, whether income support or other benefits. The cost of unemployment is extremely heavy and negative. We need to be much more imaginative than we are.

The Government need to make recommendations. The task force should perhaps suggest to the Government ways of ensuring that Government policy as a whole remains sympathetic and responsive to the needs of industry. I take as an example one current and topical issue in Cheshire. The company in question is close to my constituency and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Congleton (Mrs. Winterton). It is located in the constituency of the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody).

I refer to Rolls-Royce motors. Is the Treasury aware of the potential damage which it is doing to that company by its taxation of the corporate use of cars? Rolls-Royce is one of the few remaining genuinely British car manufacturers. Yet the proposals in the Budget, to which the House will be directing its attention in the Second Reading of the Finance Bill on Monday week, could further damage that company and force it to put hundreds more workers out of employment. They might destroy the sound home base of the company which is so important if it is to continue to export its products.

When we travel throughout the world and ask people what they know about British manufacturing industry, one of the few companies which will be first on their lips is Rolls-Royce. Therefore, it is important that there is co-ordination among all Government Departments to ensure that their policies are sympathetic to the manufacturing sector of the economy.

I have set out more than a dozen specific areas where action needs to be taken by Government. None of the measures would be contrary to the provisions of the treaty of Rome. When he is responding to my proposals, I hope that the Minister will give a more positive, constructive and fulsome response than that given recently to a positive and constructive parliamentary question.

I remind the Minister that the manufacturing sector is critical to our future economic prosperity. It produces the only non-inflationary economic growth. It is the foundation of the economies of some of our major, successful competitors, such as Germany, Japan, France, Italy and Spain, despite the problems that they are experiencing because of recession.

I hope that my right hon. Friend will accept that I have promoted the interests of manufacturing industry for all the time, almost 22 years, that I have been a Member of Parliament. I am proud to represent my constituency of Macclesfield, which has a diverse cross-section of manufacturing industry from textiles to paper and board, to light engineering, to pharmaceuticals, to chemicals, to video production and technology and to dental laboratories as well.

From the Lobby today, I learned another sad fact. The cut of 7 per cent. in the remuneration of dentists last year has led directly to the los of 25 jobs in my constituency. My hon. Friend may ask what that has to do with import substitution. It has much to do with it, because it affects productive industry. Again, there seems to have been a lack of liaison between Government Departments which are seeking to respond directly to requests by the Treasury for a reduction in public expenditure.

The Treasury has failed to appreciate the long-term effect that those decisions will have on the country and its ability to produce and to reduce the number of products that are imported. Those imports deprive our people of employment and, dare I say it to my right hon. Friend, deprive the Exchequer of much-needed income. The Government need to receive a greater income to enable them to fulfil their role. Surely my right hon. Friend is aware that, to do that, it is much better to produce more rather than to tax more. If he responds positively to the debate, I believe that the country will have a golden opportunity to achieve a second industrial revolution.

It being Ten o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Arbuthnot.]

Mr. Winterton: I had hoped to conclude my remarks before 10 o'clock, but I am delighted to be able to make a few more comments.

Surely the people would much prefer to have a Government who stimulated manufacturing industry, to create jobs and the profit—some of which will be taken by the Exchequer to be used for all the purposes for which the Government need resources—rather than a Government who, in the recent Budget, sought to take away from people huge additional sums in taxation. I believe that I am not far wrong in saying that the additional taxation that the Government will take from the people and from companies as a result of the Budget amounts to about £6 billion.

My right hon. Friend can help the people and his Government if his Department tackles the important issue of import substitution and seeks with me the achievement of a second industrial revolution—a renaissance of manufacturing in this country. He has a great deal on his shoulders, but I am confident that he is prepared to tackle the issue. I hope that he will respond positively and constructively to my firm proposals.

10.1 pm

The Minister for Industry (Mr. Tim Sainsbury): I am glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) has provided the House with another opportunity to debate an extremely important subject, manufacturing industry. I am sorry, however, that the title of the debate referred to import substitution rather than the much more important and relevant issue of the competitiveness of our industry.

I regret that some of my hon. Friend's introductory remarks focused on what he called a decline in our manufacturing industry. That is an inappropriate description when our manufacturing industrial productivity and our manufactured exports are at all-time record levels—even today, we learned of further increases. Those increases have been achieved in difficult world trading conditions. Despite those difficulties, the output of our manufacturing industry is one quarter higher than it was in 1981, and 1·5 per cent. higher than it was a year ago.

I was delighted that my hon. Friend recognised my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's commitment to manufacturing industry. I hope that he appreciates that, within our party, there is a far wider recognition of the importance of our manufacturing industry and that that recognition is not by any means recent.

I hope that my hon. Friend will not continue to judge the performance of our manufacturing industry, as he appeared to do at moments in his speech, by the number of its employees. My hon. Friend should consider one statistic that relates to our vehicle industry, which, as he is aware, is an important part of our manufacturing industry not only because of the direct employment it provides, but because of the indirect employment it provides to many subcontractors. Last year, it produced 300,000 more vehicles than it did 10 years ago, but it employed 100,000 fewer people to do so. That is a sign of what was a necessary increase in productivity.

My hon. Friend accused my Department of having provided a drab and depressing answer to a question he asked. Indeed, I understood him to say that my answer had made him dumbstruck. He was not that tonight. He was far from dumb. If he was dumbstruck, perhaps it was because he failed to analyse sufficiently the nature of international trade today. I am grateful to him for his occasional tributes to me and what my Department is doing. I would be even more grateful if we could have his more consistent support.

Mr. Winterton: My right hon. Friend is being somewhat unfair to me in his introductory remarks. Does he not pay attention to, or is he not aware of, the huge trade deficit that Britain has and the tremendous concern that is now being expressed—I referred to it in my remarks—by, for example, the Engineering Employers Federation? That organisation is not my mouthpiece, although I hope that in some ways I may be a mouthpiece for it. It is articulating much of the concern that I expressed tonight. In other words, I am not the only person expressing concern about our manufacturing base. That concern goes much further. Indeed, it goes as high as the Prime Minister, who has publicly stated his belief that manufacturing deserves a better deal.

Mr. Sainsbury: I am as aware of the nature of our trade balance as I am of the inconsistency of my hon. Friend's support for the Government he was elected to support. As I said, I am grateful for his occasional tributes, but we would like a little more consistent support from him. I assure him that I and my whole Department keep in close contact with the Engineering Employers Federation, and only yesterday I was discussing manufacturing industry with Mr. Neil Johnson.

I would like my hon. Friend and the official Opposition to recognise more readily the considerable achievements of our industry. My hon. Friend and I have a shared objective in wishing to see our manufacturing industry flourish, our manufacturing base expand and our manufacturing industries win more export orders and obtain a bigger share of the home market. Even so, we disagree over a number of aspects and methods by which we can achieve that aim.

I come to my hon. Friend's interest in import substitution, a subject to which reference is often made. It is frequently spoken as an appeal to patriotism, but I suggest that such an appeal in connection with import substitution is liable to be expensive and damaging to the economy. It is a common, if understandable, reaction to the trade deficit to which my hon. Friend referred.

I hope that all customers—individuals and retail and other business customers—will always consider whether there are United Kingdom suppliers of the products that they wish to buy. If there are, and if the foreign and domestic made products are, to all intents and purposes, of the same quality and of similar value, I hope that the purchaser—as I say, business or individual—will always buy British.

I hope that British businesses will work with their suppliers to see whether those suppliers can fill gaps so that they can purchase goods from British sources. They should recognise the benefits of having their suppliers close to their places of production, their manufacturing plants and factories. I hope that they will appreciate the considerable advantage of easier contact between a business and its supplier. Obviously, if a supplier is close by, telephone conversations are more economical and people can be in and out of each other's production facilities, readily discussing problems and opportunities face to face.

My Department, along with the Confederation of British Industry, is backing the partnership sourcing initiative, which is not new, but something that we have been involved in for a number of years. The initiative is aimed at strengthening the relationship between British purchasers of goods and their suppliers. That sort of relationship will be of mutual benefit to both parties.

There are three good reasons why the sort of import substitution that my hon. Friend appeared to be suggesting in the form of a buy British campaign is misguided and could well do more harm than good. First, the implication of such a campaign is that the Government should try to persuade customers to buy goods against their better judgment——

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): Manufacturers.

Mr. Sainsbury: If the hon. Gentleman will restrain himself and listen, I can continue with my argument that the fundamental flaw of such an appeal is that it would, if successful, send the wrong signals to British manufacturers. Buying British regardless of the price or quality of goods would not help British firms to improve their international competitiveness. It would not help them to sustain any increase in their share of the United Kingdom market. It would simply make matters worse in the long run.

That argument is particularly true because, as my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield must surely recognise —I know this to be true from my business experience—if one tries by whatever method to make customers buy goods that do not present the best value, it will not work in the longer term. Sooner or later, those customers will buy products that offer better value for money.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Sainsbury: My hon. Friend spoke for a long time, and I should like to develop my argument.

The second fundamental reason why the sort of campaign that my hon. Friend appears to be advocating would be ill conceived is one that he attacked in his speech. A Government-sponsored buy British campaign would clearly run counter to their international obligations under the general agreement on tariffs and trade, and the treaty of Rome, as would more explicit forms of import control such as licensing. We take those obligations extremely seriously, for a good reason. It would be totally unrealistic to ignore them and, worse, it would run very much against our national interests.

Mr. Winterton rose——

Mr. Sainsbury: I shall give way, to my hon. Friend for what I hope is a brief intervention.

Mr. Winterton: The Minister seems to have been listening to a totally different speech from the one that I delivered. At no stage did I say that I wanted protection or a buy British campaign. I do not think that I used the phrase "buy British" once during my speech. I want the Government to identify sectors where we are currently importing goods that we could competitively and qualitatively provide and produce in this country for our customers. Every other major industrial country does that, and I am merely asking that the United Kingdom Government should do the same for British industry.

Mr. Sainsbury: If I in any way misinterpreted what my hon. Friend said, I am glad, because, if he agrees with my analysis of why an import substitution campaign of the sort that I understood him to be suggesting would be counter-productive, we are coming together in our recognition of the realities of international trade.

My hon. Friend referred to his belief in free trade. On a number of occasions I have wondered whether his belief in free trade extended as fully to trade in textiles as it might in the interests of the consumers, as well as the producers, of Macclesfield. I hope that my hon. Friend agrees that it is in our national interest to maintain a free and open international trading system and to have fair rules firmly enforced—on that I agree with my hon. Friend.

The liberalisation of world trade benefits this country in particular. The last thing that our exporters want is to find Governments to which they export promoting nationalistic campaigns—whether they be campaigns to buy French, buy Danish, buy Argentine or buy Malaysian. When exporters hear of such campaigns, they ask us to stop them, and we do. That is why the Government believe that a successful conclusion to the Uruguay round, including the phasing out of the multi-fibre arrangement, is well worth fighting for.

As my hon. Friend, I am sure, knows, we export a quarter of our output, and our trade and manufacturinjg industry would suffer disproportionately from any Government-sponsored import substitution scheme. Those who believe otherwise are deluding themselves.

There is another powerful objection to a buy British campaign. It is too often assumed—this is my third point—by those who are perhaps not too well informed about the global nature of today's industry that it is easy to distinguish between foreign and domestic goods. I hope that my hon. Friend recognises that in practice these days it is simply not possible to do so.

Component supply knows no international boundaries. Our businesses are operating in an ever more international market. It is not just that more goods are imported and exported—that is welcome and it helps add to the wealth of nations; it is also that most products contain parts from different sources and countries. It has become steadily more difficult to identify a product that would satisfy the label "Made in Britain". A product might be assembled in Britain but consist largely of foreign-made parts; it might be assembled overseas from largely British-made parts. The same product might be made in more than one country in the Community.

I will give my hon. Friend some examples. If he were, when driving in his constituency, in Macclesfield, to overtake a Peugeot, that Peugeot might have been made in France. If he happened to be in Marseilles, for example, and overtook a similar Peugeot, it might well have been made in Coventry. And those are identical cars.

If my hon. Friend were to fly to the United States on a Boeing 747, he might be in one which had a British content of no less than 40 per cent., starting, of course, with those splendid Rolls-Royce engines—the makers not to be confused, of course, with the company that makes the Rolls-Royce cars to which he referred. He might fly on another apparently identical Boeing 747 which had hardly any British component at all.

Mr. Greg Knight (Lords Commissioner to the Treasury): Shame.

Mr. Sainsbury: I hope that he would not do so, as my hon. Friend indicates; I hope that he would always look before he got on the aircraft to see that it had Rolls-Royce engines.

So there are three overwhelming reasons why advocating import substitution in these ways is totally misguided, would not work, would send the wrong signal to British manufacturers and would be counter-productive for our exporters, as well as being against our international obligations. In today's global market, it is just impracticable. If my hon. Friend agrees with me on that, I am delighted. If I have misunderstood what he is advocating, I apologise. If he can agree with me in what I have said about import substitution, we have made real progress.

Mr. Winterton: If my right hon. Friend is merely talking about a buy British campaign whatever the quality and whatever the price, and he has been addressing himself to that sort of thing, I agree with him. But our right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has told me that he wishes to encourage import substitution and wants this country to identify areas of manufacturing which we can re-stimulate to get back into, for instance, textile machinery, which is made in my constituency, and to rebuild that sector of our economy rather than importing all the machines from Italy, Belgium, Spain, America or Germany. It seems to me that that is not an insular, inward-looking——

Mr. Mackinlay: Coal from Colombia.

Mr. Winterton: I do not wish to talk about coal from Colombia; I wish to talk about the ability of this country to regenerate the manufacturing base that it had in the past, bringing that machinery and production up to modern techniques and design. I have never stated——

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. I am very tolerant of the hon. Gentleman, but I am aware that, as a member of the Chairmen's Panel, he knows that interventions should be brief, and this is becoming a speech.

Mr. Winterton: I am trying to say to my right hon. Friend that I am not looking for a think British or buy British campaign. I am looking for the Department in which my right hon. Friend is an important Minister to seek to identify areas where we can rebuild our manufacturing base in order to reduce our huge deficit in manufactured goods.

Mr. Sainsbury: We have made some progress. I am glad that my hon. Friend agrees with me about the unsuitability of import substitution campaigns of the type that we have been describing. I hope that he will understand why I will not be able to give way to him again.

We should now turn to what the Prime Minister, the Department, the President of the Board of Trade and I all have in mind as a sensible way of helping British industry obtain a larger share of the home market. It is to help British manufacturing industry to become more efficient and more competitive against the best standards in the world. The real answer is to help British firms beat the competition, not protect them from it. That brings me to the policies that Governments should pursue.

I hope that my hon. Friend recognises that the Government whom he was elected to support can and do help British manufacturing industry win in world markets. Our policies, our initiatives, are directed at the creation of a climate for business within which companies can prosper by their own efforts. I fear that he is remarkably reluctant to recognise the progress that we made in the past decade. Our policies are directed at achieving low inflation and interest rates, a competitive exchange rate, lower tax rates, deregulation—there is further to go, and we are determined to achieve more in this area—privatisation and trade union reform. This last was perhaps the most important of all, and I hope that my hon. Friend fully supported it.

As a result of those achievements, British industry is in a much stronger position today than it was in the early 1980s. This is clear from the way in which firms have responded to the extremely difficult world trading conditions of the past two years. We should warmly congratulate our exporters. Export volumes, excluding oil and erratics, were at a record level in the fourth quarter of 1992, despite sluggish or falling demand in our main markets. United Kingdom manufactured export volume has risen by no less than four fifths since 1981. In fact, over the 1980s, it grew faster than in France, Italy, Germany, Japan and the United States.

We should also acknowledge the efforts of our companies to maintain vital investment: investment in capital equipment and in the work force, both despite the recession. In the last quarter of 1992, manufacturing investment was 2·5 per cent. higher than in the previous quarter. We should praise manufacturers for their remarkable achievements in productivity. Let us not be complacent, however. There is still a long way to go if we are to become truly competitive against the best in the world. Thanks to British manufacturers' efforts, productivity has increased by 7 per cent. over the past year.

My hon. Friend should not need to be reminded that, during the 1980s, United Kingdom productivity grew faster than in all other major industrialised countries. This was after decades at bottom of the league. In addition, our policies to encourage inward investment have helped to reinvigorate key sectors of the economy. Inward investment has helped Britain to become a major exporter of vehicles, office equipment, television sets and chemicals. Indeed, we have an exporting surplus of television sets now.

British firms are now in a position to achieve even greater gains. I am sure that my hon. Friend recognises the extent to which we helped industry in the Budget. For the second year running, no business will face a real increase in rates. The burden of advance corporation tax will be reduced, and small businesses will be helped by a range of measures, including changes to the loan guarantee scheme. Overall, Budget measures will reduce the burden on business by £1,000 million in the coming year. There are clear signs that industry is responding well. New orders are being placed. According to the CBI's latest survey, most manufacturers expect output to increase. Order books are at their most favourable since mid-1990.

Our industrial strategy does not end there. The DTI has established a number of valuable services that help British firms to meet the challenge of international competition. The enterprise initiative addresses key aspects of management: production processes, business planning, and financial and information systems. I hope that my hon. Friend is familiar with the "managing into the 1990s programme". I commend to him attendance at one of its mobile shows if it arrives in his area. The programme is designed to highlight the need for a strategic approach to improve competitiveness.

I am sure that my hon. Friend is familiar with our programme to develop one-stop shops to provide high-quality support services to British businesses. They will do that by bringing together not just the services of my Department but chambers of commerce, local authorities, TECs and other providers of business information. The DTI's new industrial competitiveness division is examining how to promote the competitiveness of British industry.

To give Ministers a better understanding of what is happening in the marketplace, the President of the Board of Trade has asked his chief economic adviser to obtain information directly from a number of major British companies. Ministers are eager to develop a more effective dialogue between Government and industry to ensure that Government policies enhance rather than impede industry's performance. That is why the President reshaped the DTI last July to achieve clearer communications with industry. Each industrial sector now has a recognised and knowledgeable point of contact. That greater knowledge in industry and in my Department is beginning to pay off.

My hon. Friend spoke about capital allowances. Of course, he will be aware of their large cost. If they were to be increased, the cost would fall at a time when the public sector borrowing requirement is high. He will be aware of the frequent criticism that high capital allowances provide a tax stimulus to businesses to do what they were about to do anyway. Worse still is that in many cases they distort investment decisions and lead to lower-quality investment. Allowances for plant and machinery are already more generous than commercial depreciation.

I appreciate my hon. Friend's important point about market intelligence. The Government can help with that. Knowing about potential markets is usually not a problem for the large, sophisticated and well-informed manufacturer. Large companies generally know who their competitors are but small and medium-sized companies may not. For example, such enterprises may not know the main importers of their competitors' products nor which firms buy from those importers.

Market intelligence on suppliers is provided by numerous commercial sources, including the Kompass database and the "Machinery Buyers Guide". Quick and easy access to such information is valuable to small firms. A recent innovation is Chambernet, which relays the Kompass database to chambers of commerce. The Government also provide valuable market intelligence on the names of importers and on import flows of particular commodities. That is done through appointed commercial marketing agents, and data on trade flows are available from CSO publications. In that way, the Government act as a facilitator to assist business. My Department is happy to help any firm requiring details of that service.

My hon. Friend referred to transport infrastructure. I remind him that British Rail investment in 1993-94 is higher in real terms than in any year in the 1980s. London Transport's investment has been unmatched in real terms for 20 years. The roads programme, maintained in cash terms, is permitting higher volume because of lower construction prices. In addition, the Chancellor's private finance initiative will play an increasing role in the modernisation of Britain's infrastructure.

I agree with my hon. Friend on the importance of deregulation. I hope that he heard what our right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said today on that subject. The President of the Board of Trade has announced the formation of seven task forces from the private sector to mount an onslaught on the regulations affecting companies. They will report progress every eight weeks to the President and the Prime Minister. Ministers have agreed that no further regulations will be imposed on British companies unless the cost to them is spelled out before the regulations are put to Parliament.

The key to sustaining growth and increasing market share for British manufacturers is improved competitiveness. United Kingdom firms now have a great opportunity. Our inflation is at its lowest for 25 years, we have the lowest interest rates in the European Community, and our exchange rate is very competitive. The Budget measures, which, as I have said, are worth £1 billion to business in the coming year, are set to boost confidence and stimulate growth.

The evidence of today shows that firms are responding to the improving economic climate. Surveys show that confidence is rising. Manufacturing output is increasing. Like my hon. Friend, the Government are keen to see British industry win a bigger share of the home market. We do not underestimate the challenge. There is no instant or easy way to become globally competitive, but we are working with industry to improve British competitiveness. I have no doubt that——

Points of Order

9.34 am

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. A month or so ago, I wrote to the Government Chief Whip asking what the Government's attitude would be to my private Member's Bill and he sent me a letter. I should be grateful for your views on the letter, which says:

"The arrangement for private Members' Bills is determined in accordance with the sessional orders and the Standing Orders of the House. It is therefore not a matter for the Chief Whip".

That is what I have always understood the position to be, but, on 19 April, a letter was sent to Conservative Members by the hon. Member for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Arbuthnot), who is a Government Whip, asking them to be present to talk on the Road Traffic (Driving Instruction by Disabled Persons) Bill, the first measure on the Order Paper, and then on my Freedom and Responsibility of the Press Bill. The understanding of a number of Conservative Members is that the intention is to talk out my Bill, and that is what I had anticipated, not being totally naive.

What is the position of the House? As I understand it, private Members' Bills drawn in the ballot should be treated as though they are normal Bills, and not operated on as though the Government can talk them out. Have you a view on the rights of Back Benchers on this matter, Madam Speaker, in terms of protecting their right to have Bills considered in a proper and factual manner and not manoeuvred against in the way that will happen this morning?

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Eltham): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. It is a well-known habit of hon. Members who want to delay or frustrate the passage of a Bill, and who are also interested in procedure, to raise a point of order. I am determined, without a letter from anybody, not only to frustrate the Bill promoted by the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley), which comes up later, but to treat the first Bill on its merits.

Would it be possible to have a ruling from you, Madam Speaker? If the hon. Member for Hammersmith, who appears not to have the votes to carry his Bill even if we reach it earlier and manage to dispose of all the amendments and new clauses, continues with his points of order, he is, in effect, filibustering his own Bill. That might meet the purpose of people such as myself who, out of courtesy to the hon. Gentleman, who is well meaning, had not intended to raise points of order. However, if he continues to raise his, I hope that I may be allowed to raise mine.

Mr. Peter Luff (Worcester): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. I should appreciate your guidance on the aspersion that the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) has cast on Conservative Members—that we are here to filibuster his Bill. I am here as someone who has taken a close interest in the affairs of disabled people. I have had the privilege of speaking in two major debates this year on the needs of disabled persons. I assure the hon. Member for Hammersmith that we are here because we wish to explore, in some further detail, the content of the excellent Road Traffic (Driving Instruction by Disabled Persons) Bill promoted by my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Sir J. Hannam), which I welcome unreservedly. I am not here in any other spirit.

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. I am disappointed that the hon. Member for Hammersmith Mr. Soley) should have started today's proceedings in this way. If the points of order are taking up time, they must affect the time that may be available to debate his important Bill. I have congratulated him on the way in which he conducted himself when he introduced the Bill and on his general good humour and manner. I was a little taken aback suddenly to find that he had tabled early-day motion 1809. I do not know whether you have had the opportunity to see that motion, Madam Speaker. I was surprised that the hon. Gentleman had tabled it, and I hope that he has taken full note of the amendment to it that has been tabled.

The hon. Gentleman spoke about a member of the Government Whips Office and referred to a letter. I have never seen such a letter. I do not believe that it exists. His allegation is an unqualified slur on the integrity of hon. Members. You might wish to see, Madam Speaker, whether he has such a letter. I hope that you will ask him to withdraw those remarks.

Madam Speaker: The hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) knows that in the House, all Bills are treated on their merits and it is not for the Chair to involve itself in correspondence that passes between one hon. Member and another, whether or not one of those hon. Members is a Whip, or the Leader of the House. Neither is it for me to discourage any hon. Member who wishes to take part in a debate. The points of order are frustrating our debate and I hope that the House will allow the first Bill to proceed. First, there is a petition, to be presented by the hon. Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson).

Mr. Soley: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. I do not intend to talk out the Bill. If I involved myself in tactics similar to those used by Conservative Members, I could easily talk on the amendments to talk out the Road Traffic (Driving Instruction by Disabled Persons) Bill. I do not intend to do so, but I could. My point is that we have a balloting system and private Members' Bills should be given serious consideration. These tactics could not be used with Government Bills. The Government would either timetable a Bill or provide extra time for it. If we are serious about the reform of the procedures of the House, Bills ought to be decided on their merits. That is not happening. Furthermore, if the hon. Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) wants to see the contents of the letter, I can show it to him.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. I hope that you will allow me to say that if we are considering whether the making of these points of order will seriously affect the progress of the hon.

[Mr. Peter Bottomley]

Gentleman's Bill, we ought to recognise that it has attracted distinguished opposition, including the editor of The Guardian, the National Union of Journalists, the Newspaper Publishers Association——

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman anticipates the second Bill on the Order Paper. If any hon. Member feels that the procedure is not correct, or could be improved, he or she has the opportunity to put the matter before the Procedure Committee. The House would be wise, I believe, to proceed with consideration of the first Bill. [Interruption.] We must not frustrate, though, presentation by the hon. Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) of a petition.

PETITION

Hadrian's Wall National Trail

9.40 am

Mr. Peter Atkinson (Hexham): I have the honour to present a petition protesting against a plan by the Countryside Commission to create a Hadrian's Wall national trail. It is signed by more than 1,600 people in my constituency, all of them either residents, farmers, landowners or those who have an educational or commercial interest in the wall and the surrounding area. They protest that the trail is planned to cater for more than 200,000 people per annum, on top of the very many who already visit the site, causing considerable problems and financial loss, particularly to farmers in the area. They further protest that the Countryside Commission's consultation paper claims that most of those consulted agree with the commission's proposals, whereas in fact they do not. Finally, they express concern at the likely impact of this vast increase in tourism on a world heritage site, valued for its remoteness and isolated beauty.

Wherefore, your Petitioners pray that your Honourable House will urge the Secretary of State for the Environment from proceeding with the aforementioned proposals, and your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

To lie upon the Table.

Orders of the Day

Road Traffic (Driving Instruction by Disabled Persons) Bill

Not amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

New Clause 1

APPLICATION OF THE PROVISIONS TO NON-DISABLED INSTRUCTORS

'The following section shall be inserted in the Road Traffic Act after section 125B—

"125C(1) A person who holds a current driving licence which is limited other than by virtue of a notice served under section 92(5)(b) of this Act may apply to the Registrar under the provisions of section 125 of this Act, for his name to be entered in the register for the purpose of giving instruction in the driving of motor cars of a class covered by his limited driving licence."'.—[Mr. Peter Bottomley.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

9.42 am

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Eltham): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second Time.

The mobility roadshow will be held on 11, 12 and 13 June at the Transport Research Laboratory at Crowthorne in Berkshire. Those who have any experience of the previous five mobility roadshows will be able to testify to the remarkable range of adaptations that have already been made to vehicles to allow those who need to overcome a disability to be mobile. When we consider new clause 4, which probes whether there should be a right of appeal against an adverse decision by an assessor, we ought to bear in mind that the mobility roadshow is, in effect, a showcase for the work that goes on at Crowthorne and in other mobility centres throughout the United Kingdom.

I suspect that later in the debate we shall get to know MAVIS better. MAVIS is the Mobility Advice and Vehicle Information Service. I think that we may hear from my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Sir J. Hannam), who has promoted his Bill with great distinction, and, perhaps, from the Minister for Roads and Traffic, who has done so much to carry forward the work to overcome mobility handicaps, that MAVIS is where some of the assessment is likely to take place.

The purpose of the mobility roadshow is to give people with disabilities the chance to test drive a wide range of models of standard production cars and vans and to try out the latest range of hand controls, as well as the wheelchairs, pavement vehicles, modifications for swivel seats and a variety of mobility-related adaptations and equipment—so important to the purpose of the Bill—which are likely to be part of the adaptations that would then qualify somebody, under the terms of the Bill, to gain employment as a driving instructor.

If the media could give advance publicity to a roadshow, the growing number of people who would benefit from going there would know about it. Perhaps I may be permitted, in the gaps between the paving stones of my speech, to say that if anyone is interested in knowing more about where to stay in the area, they can telephone 0344-770463, or 071-276-5252 for more details, which could be sent to them.

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): My hon. Friend mentioned that there are other centres. Can he tell us where they are?

9.45 am

Mr. Bottomley: If I went into that matter in too much detail, I should probably trespass on the generosity of the Chair. A guide, published by the Department of Transport and the Transport Research Laboratory, is available from MAVIS and the disability unit of the Department of Transport. It details the services in the United Kingdom that offer advice, information and assessment to disabled and elderly motorists. The guide covers not just the independent centres, ranging all the way from the Northern Ireland Council for Disability in Belfast through to MAVIS in Crowthorne, but centres in Banstead, Avon, Berkshire, Buckinghamshire, Cornwall, Derbyshire, Lancashire, Shropshire, Surrey, Tyne and Wear, Wales and Scotland.

That is important, for those who want to follow a career as driving instructors will want to know where they can obtain access to assessment, whether there are grounds for appeal against the assessment, and in what way that appeal should be made. The booklet does not cover just the independent sector. It also covers commercial establishments. That may be important to those who want their vehicles to be adapted for their use either as drivers or as passengers, for not everyone will be able to drive an adapted vehicle. Nevertheless, they want mobility.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham), who has done so much to promote the Conservative view on disability problems, not just mobility problems, has asked a sensible question. I hope that those who have the same question in mind will apply to the disability unit for the information to which he referred.

The mobility roadshow is central to my proposed new clause. People need the chance to find out whether they can drive. They need to be able to do so off public roads, in an area where there is no question of causing danger to others and where there is plenty of space so that the errors that most of us make when we learn to drive under the supervision and instruction, preferably, of a driving instructor, rather than just a friend or a member of the family, can be rectified. At the Transport Research Laboratory's test track, on its private road system, they can use, so long as they have a provisional or full driving licence, a large number of vehicles equipped with various adaptations. All drivers would be accompanied by one of the Department's driving examiners, or another experienced driver, who would be able to offer expert advice and answer queries. All cars are fitted with dual controls, so that even inexperienced or nervous drivers can have a go, in safety and with confidence.

At this point, I want to refer to the many people who give up driving too soon. They may have an exaggerated fear of their loss of ability, through old age or frailty, but particularly, for the purposes of today's debate, because they feel that some disability that has come upon them suddenly, or which has developed gradually, renders them unsafe on the roads. I recommend those drivers who have such fears to apply to MAVIS for information about where they can be assessed. That is a general point, and different from the one about those who want to become driving instructors.

[Mr. Bottomley]

The advice that I give informally—I should not want anyone to take my advice too seriously unless it is confirmed by others with more expertise—is that it is perfectly reasonable, for example, for me to continue to drive until my driving is as risky as it was when I passed my driving test at 17. I do not see why we should have a different standard for people who are maturity challenged, to describe the elderly in politically correct language, or why disabled people should abandon independent mobility when their driving is safer than those who are passing the driving test.

The House will want to pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter for the way in which he has promoted the Bill. It was a shame that there was no opportunity for a fuller debate on Second Reading because it came on after 1.30 pm on a Friday, which did not allow much time for debate and most hon. Members did not have an opportunity to serve on the Committee.

We clearly want a higher standard for driving instructors, and here, perhaps, my remarks are probably more appropriate to Third Reading. When I was at the Department of Transport I became aware, I think from Joe Hennessey, that some people were being disqualified from taking employment as driving instructors, even though they wanted only to instruct on automatic cars because that was all they were capable of driving. No one is suggesting that all disabilities can be overcome to enable someone to drive. No one is suggesting that all those who overcome disability, or those for whom the disability becomes irrelevant and who have licences, would want to become instructors and no one is suggesting that all are suitable.

As a result of the consultations, my hon. Friend has provided conditions that, in general, are fair, but what about those who have a grievance about the assessment? My hon. Friend the Member for Exeter might say—if he did not, I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister for Roads and Traffic, who has done so much to reduce casualties and to promote the opportunity of driving, would say it—that there is no realistic appeal against the failure of a test, so why should it be different for a failure on assessment? The answer is that the assessment is a far more objective measurement that is capable of being subjected to appeal. It is rather like remarking an examination paper: it does not happen often, but it is always possible to try to re-examine what was said or done or, for someone who has failed an assessment, to be able to reproduce conditions and ask, "Is this fair and right?"

I am grateful for the support of my hon. Friends the Members for Bolton, North-East and for Worcester (Mr. Luff) for new clause 4, which proposes that > "a person who is aggrieved by a decision of the assessor—

> (a) to refuse to grant an emergency control certificate, or > (b) to revoke an emergency control certificate, or
> (c) relating to modifications which may be specified in the emergency control certificate, or
> (d) relating to the recommendation as to such period of time after which a further emergency control assessment should be undergone may by notice in writing appeal to the Secretary of State within the period of twenty-eight days beginning with the day on which notice of the decision was given in accordance with this Part of the Act."

Paragraphs (a), (b), (c) and (d) are important. I will not go on at length because the House will want to debate a number of issues in the Bill, but the idea of an emergency control certificate is an inspired one—it offers the kind of simplicity and practical approach of which St. George, if he were still around today and whose birthday we spend only a little time celebrating these days, would have approved. It goes to the heart of the problem. When a novice driver is under the supervision of an instructor, is the instructor capable of bringing the vehicle to a halt—not taking over the driving, but, in effect, disabling the vehicle? The notion of the certificate is a good and clear one.

Mr. Oliver Heald (Hertfordshire, North): Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the great benefits of the emergency control certificate is that it enables people, as their condition perhaps worsens, to have further adaptations and modifications made to their vehicle, which are reflected in the certificate and thus enable them to continue to drive? That ties in with what my hon. Friend was saying about the roadshow and what is available under MAVIS. The strength of the certificate is that it is flexible but simple.

Mr. Bottomley: My hon. Friend is right, but he is tempting me to stray wider than the new clause. If people who can drive independently and, in effect, have a full licence have a condition, new or growing, that makes it likely that they will not be able to bring the vehicle to a halt in emergency conditions, they are under an obligation to notify the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency. Indeed, we are all subject to that obligation, regardless of whether we have a noticeable disability. I remind all those who are paying attention to our debate that not only driving instructors or those who wish to become instructors, but each of us, have an obligation not to drive when we are incapable of driving and, if we have a condition that is likely to be more than temporary, to notify the licensing centre of it so that, if necessary, our licence can be withdrawn and we can be referred for medical or driving assessment. That may not appear to be complicated, but it is effective as long as the message continues to get through to people.

The DVLA would decide whether an ordinary driver requires an emergency control certificate. It might want to discuss with the Department's medical advisers whether an emergency control certificate should be more widely available to people whose condition might in future fall into paragraph (d). Clearly, that paragraph could be widened. If I continue on those lines, I shall be going beyond whether qualified drivers should be able to appeal against an assessment that says that they cannot proceed to become a driving instructor.

Mr. Heald: I am sorry to trespass on my hon. Friend's good will, but, as the proposed system is so flexible and someone can take another control assessment within six months, is there any great benefit in having an appeal, the effect of which would be to add another layer of bureaucracy and to require the Secretary of State to consider such issues and to second-guess the assessor? Would not it be better if aggrieved people took a second test, as they do under the driving test?

Mr. Bottomley: That is the point before the House. My hon. Friend has a reputation as one of the radical young Turks of the Tory party who wants to strip away the red tape and I suppose that his argument needs to be balanced against my idea of fairness. When the then Prime Minster called me in during the summer of 1990 and said that I was doing a frightfully good job in Northern Ireland "and, by the way, you are sacked", she reminded me that there is a lot of rough justice in government. If one spends a lot of time trying to enact legislation or make administrative decisions that are perfect for everybody, one does not get very far and the responsibilities of government are broader than that. When proposing legislation, we can say, "All right, there will be unfairness. Peter Bottomley can speak up for the aggrieved person, but my hon. Friend"——

Mr. Heald: The Member for Hertfordshire, North.

Mr. Bottomley: I tried not to identify my hon. Friend because it might embarrass him. The mood has now changed and we are all supposed to be soft, caring Tories like myself. If my hon. Friend wants to be identified with his own remarks, so be it, but I shall speak for those who feel aggrieved because they believe that they failed an assessment unfairly. My hon. Friend can say, "Just wait six months and avoid this extra layer of bureaucracy." I have never been too sure that one should regard the motion of an appeal as bureaucracy. If I were convicted unfairly or unjustly or, from the point of view of lawyers and, more important, against the law, I could appeal to a higher court two or three times. I am not sure that one should refer to the Judicial Committee of the House of Lords, the Court of Appeal or the High Court as "bureaucracy", but my hon. Friend is a lawyer and no doubt knows much more about it.

10 am

I must return to the decision that the House must take. Is it better for there to be no appeal against assessment, as there is no effective appeal against a test failure? I suspect that there is an appeal, but how does one recreate the necessary conditions? I am willing to be convinced, not that the new clause is wrong—it is clearly right—but that it should not be accepted on grounds of practice.

One could argue that it is unlikely that people would be wrongly failed and that the system is designed to let through as many people as possible, rather than to block as many as possible. One may argue that it will be obvious when someone has failed the test for an emergency control certificate by, for example, knocking down the cones on the test ground at Crowthorne. The situation may be similar to that involving alcohol testing for drivers.

During my service at the Department of Transport, well over 1 million people were tested for alcohol and not a single one complained to his Member of Parliament about the result. The people tested who had not taken any alcohol regarded themselves as potential victims; those whose tests were between zero and the legal limit wiped the perspiration from their forehead and said "Thank heavens"; and those who were above the legal limit knew that they had been caught bang to rights and had no grounds for complaint.

In this case, if the House is not minded to accept the eminently sensible new clause, I hope that, as part of the emergency control assessment, if someone has failed, the assessor will allow the candidate to try again, using the distance in which people should be able to stop a vehicle, and see whether he and the driving instructor candidate can agree why the candidate has been refused a certificate. Such a practical approach may be better than the legislative provision, which my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, North (Mr. Heald), in rather heavy language, called "another layer of bureaucracy".

Mr. Thurnham: Is my hon. Friend satisfied that there are sufficient provisions for the assessor to make clear the reasons why someone is failed? I am a little uncertain about whether the Bill goes far enough in that respect. If people are to fail on account of a disability, it is important that they should know that, and should perhaps be able to discuss the matter further. That is an important part of the appeals procedure because someone could be failed time and again on the six months' basis without knowing why.

Mr. Bottomley: I should be interested to hear my hon. Friend answer his own question. I think that I am falling into the trap of exaggerating the possible problems. The national vice-chairman of the Disabled Drivers Association, Mr. Hennessey, is quoted as saying:

> "It is many years since one of our members from Coventry was denied the opportunity to become a driving instructor and become gainfully employed, because she only had a licence to drive cars with automatic transmission. The 'Disabled Drivers Association' warmly welcomes this Bill which will remove the present discrimination against disabled drivers and enable those who wish to work as driving instructors to do so."

As my hon. Friend knows, those comments were backed up by Bert Massey, the distinguished director of the Royal Society for Disability and Rehabilitation, who said:

> "RADAR warmly welcomes this Bill, which if passed, will enable disabled drivers to become driving instructors. The Bill will affect a small number of disabled people, but removes a barrier to them becoming 'economically active' and assisting other disabled people to become 'independently mobile'. We very much hope the House will grant it a Second Reading."

The Bill has received a Second Reading, but the two quotations remind us that, in the main, we are talking about people driving cars with automatic transmission.

We are talking about people using one foot for the accelerator and the brake, as I would if I were driving an automatic transmission car—or one hand if there were hand controls; I am not arguing that one necessarily needs feet, but I am taking the most general example. In those circumstances, there is no difficulty about the emergency control certificate. It could be argued that, by talking about foot control or hand control, I am exaggerating the problem. Even people represented by RADAR and the Disabled Drivers Association might tell me that I do not need to pursue the issue at great length and that the assessors are perfectly happy to explain to those who will not receive the certificate why they will not receive it, a point mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East.

If I were to watch a demonstration, I suspect that I could find that the prospective driving instructor would accept the assessor's decision. If I get the opportunity to go to Crowthorne, an assessor might say, "This is how it happens. There is not going to be a problem." If my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter can convince me that that is so, I shall not push the new clause to a vote, but we should hear what he has to say. I suspect that other people will be worrying about whether the reassessment of the decision should have to wait for six months, as suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, North, or should be a matter for appeal. I am making a relatively narrow point and am not suggesting reassessing the whole driving test.

Mr. Thurnham: I begin by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Sir J. Hannam) on his good fortune in winning the ballot for a second time. I have entered all the ballots available but got nowhere, either for private Members' Bills or for private Members' motions. I also congratulate him on his great work for the disabled. I believe that he has been a member of the all-party parliamentary disablement group for about 20 years, which shows the length of his commitment. He has also supported other groups, including the Conservative disability group, and I look forward to visiting his constituency a little later this year to meet some of his constituents and to learn more about his work.

In my early days in the House, my hon. Friend introduced the Corneal Tissue Act 1986. I was not aware of all the shenanigans that can sometimes accompany private Members' Bills. One hon. Member approached me and asked whether I would be present on Friday. He could not be here and there was a danger that his Bill would not proceed because of another Bill. He asked me whether I would kindly shout, "Object" when the eighth Bill on the Order Paper was called. His Bill was an important one dealing with child abuse. I thought that it would be a good thing to help him so I said that I was sure I could do that. It was not until he had left and began to make further inquiries that I discovered that the eighth Bill—if I remember the number correctly—was the Corneal Tissue Bill. Had I shouted "Object", I might have prevented it from, making progress. Fortunately, I became aware of the dangers into which I might have fallen. The other hon. Member, who had better remain nameless, had to remain in the queue. I forget what happened to his Bill, but I am delighted that the Corneal Tissue Act 1986 reached the statute book.

If hon. Members are lucky in the ballot, it is especially important that they choose a Bill that will reach the statute book rather than a Bill that is bound to be highly contentious and has only the remotest chance of being passed. In choosing the Road Traffic (Driving Instruction by Disabled Persons) Bill, my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter has shown great wisdom in choosing a Bill which has good prospects of reaching the statute book and will be enormously helpful to many people.

I do not know how many people it is envisaged will become driving instructors under the Bill. We know that more than 100,000 people have taken advantage of the excellent motability scheme and have obtained cars through it. There may be a greater number of disabled driving instructors than has been imagined. By getting rid of a barrier here—regrettably, there are still barriers elsewhere for disabled people who seek employment—and by opening up an avenue, more people will come through.

I am a little concerned that there seem to be two classes of people under the Bill—ordinary driving instructors and registered disabled driving instructors. It may be possible to consider that aspect further. The appeals procedure is important because people should be left in no doubt if there is a difficulty.

I was fortunate in being a member of the Committee that considered the Bill. However, the Committee clashed with the Committee considering the Freedom and Responsibility of the Press Bill. My ability to attend the Committee considering this Bill was limited because I was selected to be a member of both Committees. I am pleased that the Bill made such rapid progress and that we can give it further consideration today.

I have not had the opportunity to visit the Mobility Advice and Vehicle Information Service at Crowthorne in Berkshire, but I hope that I may have a future opportunity to do so. I am impressed by the reports about it. I hope that facilities can be made available to people with disabilities in as many parts of the country as possible so that they can take advantage of the expertise held by the Department of Transport in that sector.

I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) was concerned with the centre when he was a Minister at the Department of Transport and I pay tribute to his work at the Department. The encouraging figures for road accidents are a great tribute to his work and to the work of other Ministers, including my hon. Friend the Minister for Roads and Traffic. Great credit is due to my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham for his work on this issue and for his work on drink-driving. He showed great common sense in charting the way forward. The figures prove the wisdom of my hon. Friend's approach when he was at the Department of Transport.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I certainly do not mind my hon. Friend continuing to speak about me in that way. It is worth remembering that I was only a paragraph in a chapter because Barbara Castle introduced the breath alyser in 1967. What worked in drink-driving was sticking to things that mattered. The same applies to disability. Tribute should be paid to those who carried forward the United Kingdom effort after the international year of disabled people. The Department of Transport set up a disability unit and consulted the Sir Peter Baldwin committee—the disabled persons transport advisory committee—on which my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter served with great distinction, together with Lewis Carter-Jones. That provided the drive and combined the expertise. All that Ministers have to do is to turn up when asked and say the things that have been put in their hands, and that Parliament and Government care about these matters.

Mr. Thurnham: My hon. Friend is being very modest about the part that he played. Even if that was the extent of what he had to do, he did it extraordinarily well. I am pleased that he and I have been able to put our names to the new clause which deals with appeals in relation to the emergency control certificate, which is a key provision.

I was in a sense fortunate when I learnt to drive because it was at the time of the Suez crisis. All the driving instructors were taken away to issue petrol coupons and we were allowed to drive on our own. That was in the days before MOT certificates so not every car was as roadworthy as they are these days. There may have been times when I would have had difficulty in achieving an emergency control certificate because of the vehicles I was driving. I have no doubt that they would all be worth a fortune now if they were still on the roads. Perhaps they were consigned to the scrap heap long ago. The MOT certificate has ensured that every car on the roads is in far better condition.

In Japan, the MOT certificate is so tough to obtain that after six years, cars have to have their whole braking system replaced. The result is that Japan exports most cars that are more than six years old to China and to other countries where people are not so worried about braking systems. The Japanese motor industry is able to achieve great output and turnover because of the MOT certificate.

My hon. Friend the Minister may like to bear that in mind, although it might not be the most popular measure with people who own older cars.

The new clause would allow people to appeal if they are turned down. We do not have enough opportunities for appeals. I do not know whether the citizens charter comes into this. Bureaucracy is sometimes able to make its decisions without making clear why those decisions have been made and without allowing any process of appeal.

I can understand that if a disabled driver is turned down again and again and has to wait six months before he can apply again, he wants to be given sufficient reason. When my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter comments on the new clause, he may be able to clarify the extent to which the assessors will be responsible for telling people why they have failed. If they have no duty to make the reasons clear, there could be great frustration. There might then be a need for an appeal procedure. People with disabilities can find that their lives are frustrated if barriers and difficulties are placed in their way. The purpose and attraction of the Bill are that it removes barriers. However, there is a hurdle here over which disabled drivers must get. I should like to think that the Bill will help people to get over the hurdle and that any difficulties will be made clear to them.

Mr. Alan Duncan (Rutland and Melton): It is proposed that the person who is appealing will have 28 days in which to do so, beginning with the day on which the notice of the decision is given. The new clause is fairly vague on this point. The person who has declined to grant the emergency control certificate or who has revoked it will simply give notice in writing to that person of his decision and will include the reasons for it.

Is there a danger that the 28 days are not enough? Someone may have written a letter advising the person of the decision. A secretary may have sat on the letter for two or three days. The date on the letter may say the 21st, but it may not have been posted until the 28th. There may then be a weekend or a public holiday. The decision can affect the entire livelihood of an individual who may find that he has less than three weeks in which to appeal. He will need to take legal advice. If, in a few years' time, the provision is not uppermost in people's minds, it may take quite a lot of digging through law books to find out what a person's rights are. Does my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) consider that 28 days is sufficient for an appeal which may dramatically affect the life of a disabled person?

Mr. Thurnham: My hon. Friend is right to point out that there can be practical difficulties. People may be away from their home address so the 28 days could become quite tight. Not every disabled person can get the guidance and advice that he needs. That could mean, as my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan) has pointed out, that there is a danger of exceeding that period. Some period has to be stipulated, but we should perhaps consider extending it a little further. The issue may be resolved today, or it may be considered further when the Bill, as I very much hope it will, goes to the other place.

One of the best features of the upper House is that its Members come to debates on disability issues with considerable experience. No doubt some of their Lordships will be able to bring special expertise to bear on the question of how long the time should be and whether a 28-day timetable is tighter than is justified. The period could be anything up to six months, when a new assessment could take place anyway. I hope that that point can be considered further, either today or in the other place.

I welcome the measures that the Government have taken to help disabled drivers. The motability scheme has been enormously successful, and I understand that the motability fleet is the largest of its kind in Europe. I praise those in my constituency, including Mr. Harry Bowers of Kirkby Central Motors, who have done much to help disabled people to come to terms with their disability and to open up for themselves a whole new vista of mobility. If they can then develop that into a job by becoming driving instructors, so much the better. I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter will be surprised by the success that his Bill will have when it reaches the statute book and people can take advantage of its provisions to make an economic contribution to our national life as well as enhancing their own lives. That is very much to my hon. Friend's credit and I wish him well with the Bill.

Mr. Peter Luff (Worcester): Let me preface my remarks by paying tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Sir J. Hannam) for the skilful way in which he has piloted the Bill through the House so far and congratulating him on his excellent work for the disabled, some of which I have had the pleasure to witness during a number of debates in this place.

The new clause that my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) seeks to insert into the Bill is important. As my hon. Friend said, it deals with the single most ingenious concept in the Bill, which will enable its provisions to work satisfactorily. The emergency control certificate was defined precisely by my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter on Second Reading:

> "A disabled person who holds a valid emergency control certificate, and who has passed the necessary written and practical qualifying tests, just as non-disabled people have to qualify, will be able to have his or her name entered in the register of approved driving instructors. That would enable a disabled person to give paid driving instruction, although he or she would be restricted to cars with automatic transmission and with any other special modifications that might be specified in the emergency control certificate."

Access to the emergency control certificate is therefore the essential requirement for a disabled person who wishes to become a driving instructor.

As my hon. Friend also remarked on Second Reading, that certificate is the central concept and the key safeguard relating to road safety. Safety is the principal concern that those who are not disabled may have about the possibility of disabled people being allowed to become driving instructors, and I congratulate my hon. Friend on the effective way in which he has dealt with that concern.

My hon. Friend said on Second Reading:

> "Although it is necessary for road safety purposes that additional requirements should be placed on disabled people, it should not act as a disincentive to disabled people who want to qualify as approved driving instructors".—[Official Report, 11 December 1992; Vol. 215, c. 1162.]

It is precisely because of my concern that there should be no such obstacle placed in the way of disabled people that I have added my name to the new clause. I am somewhat concerned that my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham seemed to suggest that he intended to withdraw it. I welcome the clause, because I believe that the possibility of being unsuccessful in applying for an emergency control certificate or having an emergency control certificate revoked is rather different from failing one's driving test, for which one is given specific reasons. The possibility exists of discrimination, intentional or unintentional, against disabled people and the existence of a court of appeal in the form of the Secretary of State should commend itself to the House.

My one concern about the new clause is that perhaps it does not go far enough. I note that it imposes no duty on the Secretary of State in respect of the speed of his or her response to the appeal. Hon. Members who have the privilege of dealing with members of the Government on a variety of constituency issues know that one can wait a very long time for a reply, although I am happy to say that, in my experience, the Department of Transport replies speedily, and I congratulate those concerned. In the event of the House accepting the new clause, would it be possible for a subsequent amendment to be tabled in the other place to impose a duty on the Secretary of State to reply within a given period? I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham will address that point in due course.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I imagine that it would be possible to ask Mr. Deputy Speaker whether he would accept a manuscript amendment, although I suspect that my hon. Friend has answered his own question. We need to know how many people are likely to be unsuccessful in obtaining an emergency control certificate. I may have been making a mountain out of a molehill, but I feel that we must look for justice on every occasion.

Mr. Luff: My hon. Friend is entirely right, and the whole Bill is about justice. It is precisely because the new clause seems to me to make the Bill still more just that I welcome it. I do not know whether my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter plans to speak, but if he does, he may wish to address himself to my remarks.
